During the course of the proceedings I was asked to examine and report with reference to certain constitutional questions raised by virtue of the failure of Mr. KELLER, a Member of the House, to respond to the subpoena of the House requiring his appearance as a witness before the Judiciary Committee. I complied with that request. I have no pride of authorship in the matter, but I agree with my colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that it is rather important whether or not it shall be established as a precedent that a Member of the House, possessed of information valuable to the House in the discharge of a public duty, shall be permitted to lock that information in his own breast and defy all the processes of the House, to the public injury. But I do not agree with my colleague that it should be established as a precedent that the Member has that power. I do not believe such a precedent would be according to law or in line with sound public policy. I agree that the duties of the individual to his constituency are important. Each constituency is interested in the presence of its Member. Each constituency is also interested in the general efficiency of the legislative branch. There is no conflict between the duty of the Member to represent his constituency and the duty of the Member to contribute what he knows to the general public benefit, unless he himself establishes that conflict.

At this time I would like it clearly understood that what I shall say has no application particularly to the failure of Mr. KELLER to appear. I did not vote for the report of the Judiciary Committee. I do not feel unkindly toward him. I sat on the side and watched the performance, as it were, and I did not get angry at him, as did some. However, I have the interest which I have just stated. In the time that I have at my disposal I shall not be able to analyze this question, but I shall file the brief referred to, which I hope the Members of this House will read. At this time I shall touch only the high points.

The Constitution provides that in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace a Member of the House shall be free from arrest during his attendance on the session and going to and coming from the House. I lay down this proposition and I challenge anybody to refute it. If that provision of the Constitution is operative against the Houses of Congress, the House can not arrest a Member of the House for any offense. The language is as plain as it can be, "in all" cases, except three, with regard to neither of which does the House have any jurisdiction other than legislative.

Now, the Constitution provides that the House may punish for disorderly behavior, but there is no express grant of power in that provision to arrest, and I challenge any lawyer on this proposition, if the arrest clause is operative against the House no implied power can be admitted. You can not imply power to do that against which a double negative is expressed. That clause says "in all" cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace. Every lawyer knows that the enumerated exceptions exclude others. So we have a double negative against any assumption of an implied power to arrest a Member for disorderly behavior if the position of my colleague is sound. We are talking of constitutional powers. I challenge any lawyer on that proposition. How could you get an implied power against a double negative interposed against that power? This provision in our Constitution was taken from the law of Parliament, as you will observe when you examine the brief.

At the time we adopted this provision into our Constitution—and I challenge anybody in this House on this—no Member of Parliament had a single privilege which he could claim against the House of which he was a Member. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared, and Story so announces in his work on the Constitution, it is elementary that when a law is borrowed from another jurisdiction it comes into the jurisdiction in which it is incorporated with the constructions and modifications which were operative at the time it was borrowed. Elementary writers and the courts agree that a Member of the House acquired no privilege under this provision of the Constitution which the member of Parliament did not enjoy at the time it was incorporated into our Constitution. From the beginning of Parliament there never has been a challenge of the power of the Houses to control and compel the attendance of their respective members.

The precedents show that from time immemorial the Houses have exercised that power. My friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] cites the case of Bell. Bell interposed an objection, but he testified under protest, and the remarkable thing about his objection was that he claimed it was an intrusion of the Executive into the internal affairs of Congress. That was the chief ground of his objection. That was a good objection if sustained by the facts. Parliamentary privilege was established to keep out both the executive and the judiciary and to leave all internal matters to congressional control. Parliamentary privileges grew up in those days when the Houses of Parliament, and especially the Commons, were fighting the battles of the English people against the tyranny of the Crown. They surrounded themselves with these parliamentary privileges, beyond the bounds of which neither the Executive nor the judiciary could go, and never in one single instance in this government of the two Houses of Great Britain did they permit the interposition of the executive power or the direction of the judiciary. Why, that is the philosophy that makes workable this scheme of government of coordinate branches.

What would my distinguished friend from Texas have? He would have the judicial branch of the Government come into the very heart of legislative control and interpose the power of the judiciary and override the will and the judgment of the House seeking to discharge a high constitutional duty with regard to impeachment. I am opposed to establishing such a precedent. I want the executive and the judiciary to stay out. I am talking purely now about constitutional privilege. When it comes to the question of putting a man in jail that is a different question that addresses itself to the conscience and judgment of the House. I believe the House of which I am a Member is just as honest and conscientious and capable of rendering a fair and honest judgment as any court that ever sat in the world. [Applause.] Whenever I am afraid to leave to the men with whom I sit side by side the question of whether or not I should go to jail or testify I will quit this body. The committee can not send anyone to jail; only the House can do it. There never was a day, there never was a minute, in any government organized along the line of this Government that you could permit a thing like that which is claimed. A government of coordinate branches could not live; we would become subordinate to the judiciary.

Blackstone lays it down as fundamental that whatever thing arisen in each House shall be adjudicated there and nowhere else.

I am surprised that my distinguished friend from Texas, a man who sits in this House, in view of the battles that have been fought by the Commons in the history of old England, and in view of the position which our ancestors have taken, that the Houses, the legislative branch of this Government, shall be free from judicial interference, would be willing to open the door that has been barred for these hundreds of years against judicial interference and confess to the world that he is unwilling to risk the judgment of his colleagues, men of integrity, men who are interested in preventing the establishment of a precedent that would interfere with a Member representing his constituents. Do not you think every man who sits on this floor is interested in preventing the establishment of a precedent that would interfere with his opportunity to represent his constituents? Here is the place for the judgment to be. We are the most capable of judging. That is why the framers of the Constitution left the right to judge where they found it in the English system. They took no chances. They lifted bodily the law of privilege as to arrest from the English system and embodied it in our Constitution. We are not going to establish precedents which will hurt the independence of the Member, nor will we give to him an unnecessary privilege which will hurt the House in the discharge of its constitutional duties.

Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in this matter which is not shared by every Member of this House. For whatever it may be worth I submit the brief referred to in which I have undertaken to discuss this question in some detail:

BRIEF BY HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS IN RE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS RAISED BY THE REFUSAL OF THE HON. OSCAR E. KELLER TO OBEY THE SUBPENA OF THE HOUSE DIRECTING HIM TO APPEAR AND TESTIFY BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE.

On the 11th day of September, 1922, the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER, a Representative in Congress from the fourth district of Minnesota, preferred impeachment charges against the Hon. Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States. On the same date House Resolution 425, together with such charges, was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

On the 1st of December, 1922, at the request of the Judiciary Committee, the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER filed specifications.

On the 12th day of December, 1922, hearing of testimony on specification No. 13 was begun. At the conclusion of the hearing on the next charge considered, No. 4, the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER filed a written statement with the committee, challenging its good faith, stating that he would not further proceed before the committee, and withdrew from the Chamber. Thereupon a subpoena, signed by the Speaker of the House, was issued and served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House upon the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER, commanding him to appear as a witness before the Judiciary Committee of the House, which subpoena he disregarded.

His attorney, appearing before the committee, advised the committee that the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER had determined not to appear as a witness, claiming that his privilege as a Member of the House protects him against all compulsory process of the House.

An examination of the American precedents and of the decisions of our courts discloses that the issue here raised, while not a new one in so far as the exercise of power on the part of the Houses of Congress is concerned, has never been directly passed upon by either House of Congress, by the Supreme Court, or by any other court in so far as I have been able to ascertain.

The precedents disclose, however, that each of the Houses of Congress, as occasion has developed, has proceeded to summon its respective Members as witnesses before its committees. In only one instance has a Member raised the question of his privilege to disregard the summons of his House. In that instance the issue between the House under its claim of power and the Member under his claim of privilege was avoided by the appearance and testimony of the Member, under protest.

It is to be borne in mind that the claim of privilege under consideration, as made, is not one addressed to the discretion of the House. It is a claim of privilege made against the House, a claim of constitutional privilege, which challenges the jurisdiction of the House and indicates a purpose, in the event of attempted coercion on the part of the House, to appeal to the judicial branch of the Government against the House, alleging an attempt on the part of the House to exercise a power denied to it by the Constitution.

Looking to the Constitution itself, we find the declaration of congressional privilege with reference to arrest to be stated in this language:

"They (the Senators and Representatives) shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; * * * (Art. I, sec. 6, Const.)"

At common law, "breach of the peace" meant a breaking of the public peace. Blackstone tells us that:

"Felony in the general acceptance of our English law comprises every species of crime which occasions at common law the forfeiture of lands and goods. This most frequently happens in those crimes for which a capital punishment either is or was liable to be inflicted. (Blackstone, vol. 4, p. 94, Tucker's edition.)"

"This privilege from arrest privileged them, of course, against process, the disobedience of which is punishable by attachment." (Story, p. 860.)

The determination of the question whether or not the House can compel its Members to testify before its committees depends upon whether the clause of the Constitution just quoted is operative in favor of the Member against the House of which he is a Member, or was intended as a privilege of Congress operative only in behalf of the Houses of Congress and their respective Members against outside interference.

It is an interesting and, as we shall discover, an important fact, that this provision of our Constitution was borrowed from the law of the British Parliament, or rather we borrowed from that law its formula, of ancient origin, by which, from time immemorial, the British Parliament had declared its privilege with reference to arrest.

We find upon an examination of British precedents one decision—I quote from the great English authority, Sir Erskine May, in his Parliamentary Practice, page 112, discussing the privilege of members of Parliament with reference to arrest:

"In Larke's case, in 1429, the privilege was claimed, 'except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.'"

And in the famous Thorpe case:

"The judges made exceptions to such cases as be 'for treason, or felony, or surety of the peace.'"

And

"By a resolution of the Commons, 20th May, 1675, 'that by the laws and usage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every member of the House of Commons in all cases except 'treason, felony, and breach of the peace.'"

Delegates to the Continental Congress asserted this privilege and expressed it in the same formula:

"And the Members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrest and imprisonment during the time of their going to and from their attendance upon Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace." (Art. V.)

In Williamson v. United States, 207 U. S. 425, Williamson, a Member of Congress, having plead his privilege, under the clause of the Constitution quoted, against arrest and conviction during a session of Congress, etc., for conspiracy to commit the crime of subornation of perjury, not a felony at common law, and the case having reached the Supreme Court, Chief Justice White, for the court, after quoting Lord Chancellor Brougham in the Wellesly case, in which Lord Brougham held that "he who has privileges of Parliament * * * can in no criminal matter be heard to urge such privilege," declared:

"* * * by text-writers of authority in this country it has been recognized from the beginning that the convention which framed the Constitution, in adopting the words 'treason, felony, and breach of the peace,' as applied to the privileges of the parliamentary body, used those words in the sense which the identical words had been settled to mean in England."

Continuing, the court quotes from Story's treatise on the Constitution:

"The exception to the privilege is that it shall not extend to 'treason, felony, or breach of the peace.' These words are the same as those in which the exception to the privilege of Parliament is usually expressed at the common law, and doubtless were borrowed from that source. * * *

"In short, that as in a multitude of other cases they—the framers of the Constitution—intended to adopt with the words the full meaning which had been given to them by usage and authoritative construction" (p. 567).

In its conclusion the court held that:

"Exemption from legal process—of Members of Congress—may be considered the same as it is in England. * * *

"Since from the foregoing it follows that the terms 'treason, felony, and breach of the peace' as used in the constitutional provision relied upon except from the operation of the privilege all criminal offenses, the conclusion results that the claim of privilege of exemption from arrest and sentence was without merit."

It may be of interest that in 1875 the Judiciary Committee of the House held to the same effect as the Supreme Court later held in the Williamson case.

Robert Small, a Member of the House of Representatives from South Carolina, was indicted in that State for having accepted a bribe while a member of the State legislature; was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to serve five years in the penitentiary. The offense charged was a misdemeanor in South Carolina, neither 'treason, felony, nor a breach of the peace.' On the ground that such an offense not being included among those exceptions enumerated in our Constitution for which a Member of Congress may be arrested, during the sessions, etc., the matter of privilege was raised in the House and also in the court where the cause was pending. Both by the House and by the court it was held that the declaration of congressional privilege embodied in our Constitution, having been taken from the British law of parliamentary privilege, should be given the meaning and scope given to it in Great Britain at the time of its incorporation into our Constitution.

This brief quotation is taken from the report of the committee:

"They—the words 'treason, felony, and breach of the peace'—were copied literally from the familiar rule of English parliamentary law, and were evidently intended to be taken in the same sense in which they were there understood."

That the framers of the Constitution should have proceeded to incorporate into our Constitution a provision from the law of the British Parliament without even deeming it necessary to place some expression in the Constitution to show that it was the parliamentary privilege as then construed, rather than the privilege expressed by the words used, if given their common-law meaning, which was made a part of our Constitution, will not seem so extraordinary when the history of parliamentary law and privileges in this country is considered. British parliamentary law became established in this country with the beginning of representative government here. It was the law and the usage of the colonial assemblies. It was in operation during the existence of the Continental Congress. It governed in the deliberation of the Constitutional Convention. The formula by which the parliamentary privileges were ordinarily declared was embodied in the Articles of Confederation. The precedents and resolutions by which surrender and adaptation had come about were as familiar to American statesmen and the American people as to British statesmen and the British people at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and were as operative here at that time as in Great Britain. We had appropriated the whole thing, formula of expression, construction, and modification long before the Constitution was framed. The authority of the rules and precedents of the British Parliament has been recognized by both Houses of Congress from the beginning. Jefferson's Manual, which is now the recognized authority in the absence of a rule or precedent of our own, in the main is his interpretation and construction of the British rules and precedents.

In so far as the records disclose, this provision was adopted without debate. Apparently it was assumed, and doubtless was a fact, that all those present knew from where it came and what it meant. Not only were the words "except for treason, felony, and breach of the peace" borrowed from the law of the British Parliament but the whole clause of which these words are a part, as can be seen by comparison, came from that source. In fact, our entire law of congressional privilege came from the law of privilege of the British Parliament. There is scarcely any variation in language as between the usual method of stating the laws of privilege of the British Parliament and corresponding provisions in our Constitution dealing with the powers and privileges of Congress and of the Houses thereof.

It would seem there can be no question but that the authorities thus far examined establish two points: First, that the clause in our Constitution with reference to the privilege from arrest of Members of Congress was borrowed from the law of the British Parliament, and second, that in our Constitution these borrowed words are to be given the same scope and meaning which was given to them as a part of the law of the British Parliament at the time of their adoption into our Constitution. As Story puts it, and Chief Justice White quotes with approval, "they—the framers of the Constitution—intended to adopt with the words the full meaning which had been given to them by usage and authoritative construction." (Story, 567.)

The next question is, How was the law of privilege of Parliament, and especially this clause with reference to arrest, understood and applied as between the member of a house of Parliament and the house of which he was a member at the time these words were adopted into our Constitution? If at that time they did not establish or declare any privilege which the member of Parliament could enforce against the will and judgment of the house of which he was a member, it must follow that their adoption into our Constitution did not create any privilege which the Members of Congress can claim against the will and judgment of the House of which he is a Member. The converse of that proposition is also true, of course.

Sir William Blackstone, commenting on the laws of Parliament, says:

"It will be sufficient to observe that the whole of the law of the custom of Parliament has its origin from this one maxim, 'that whatever matter arises concerning either house of Parliament ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that house to which it relates, and not elsewhere.' Hence, for instance, the lords will not suffer the Commons to interfere in settling the election of a peer of Scotland; the Commons will not allow the lords to judge of the election of a Burgess; nor will either house permit the subordinate courts of law to examine the merits of either case. But the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in the breast of the Parliament itself." (Commentaries, Book I, chap 2, p. 163.)

The House of Commons, with reference to this privilege, declared in 1641:

"(3) It is not to be allowed in case of public service for the Commonwealth, for that it must not be used for the danger of the Commonwealth. (4) It is in the power of the Parliament and doth not bind the Parliament itself." (2 Com., p. 261.)

"It is in the power of the Parliament and doth not bind the Parliament itself." By adoption into our Constitution it became the power of Congress, and, it would seem under our own authorities cited, the conclusion would be sound that it doth not bind the Congress itself.

The highest court of England in 1839, in Stockdale v. Hansard, opinion by Justice Littledale, says:

"It is said the House of Commons is the sole judge of its privileges, and so I admit, as far as proceedings in the house and some other things are concerned."

In Bradclough v. Gossett, opinion by Justice Stephens, the court says: "the House of Commons has the exclusive power to interpret a statute so far as the regulation of its own proceedings within its own walls is concerned, and even if that interpretation should be erroneous, this court has no power to interfere with it, directly or indirectly."

As the Commons said with reference to this particular privilege under consideration:

"It is the power of Parliament and doth not bind the Parliament itself."

As Blackstone says:

"The whole of the law of the customs of Parliament had its origin in this one maxim, 'that whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that house to which it relates, and not elsewhere.'"

And the highest court of England has held:

"The House of Commons is the sole judge of its privileges * * * so far as proceedings in the house * * * are concerned."

And again:

"The House of Commons has the exclusive power to interpret a statute so far as the regulation of its own proceedings within its own walls is concerned, and even if that interpretation should be erroneous, this court has no power to interfere with it, directly or indirectly."

We recognize the same principle in our law. It is fundamental to the very existence of every government of coordinate branches. Each of the Houses of Congress make its own laws of procedure. It determines the qualifications and the fact of election of its own Members. It punishes them for disorderly behavior. It has the right to expel them for any cause whatever. If its acts should be erroneous, there is no appeal. The maxim of the British law is applied "that whatever matter arises concerning either house * * * ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that house to which it relates and not elsewhere."

What is said in their debates can not be questioned elsewhere. Within their own walls they are exclusive, final, and supreme. That is the plan which makes workable the philosophy of a government of coordinate branches.

As to the justification for and the object sought to be attained by "privileges of Parliament," Blackstone says:

"Privilege of Parliament was principally established in order to protect its members not only from being molested by their fellow subjects but also more especially from being oppressed by the power of the Crown."

In so far as I have been able to discover, no commentator, no precedent, no judicial interpretation indicates that one of these privileges, at the time of their adoption into our Constitution, was the privilege of the Member against the House of which he is a Member, nor could he appeal with reference thereto to any other tribunal.

At the time of the adoption of our Constitution there was not only no claim of privilege on the part of the Member operative against the House of which he was a Member, but, to the contrary, there was then and had been from time immemorial the positive assertion and definite exercise by the houses of Parliament of a power over their respective members, acquiesced in, utterly inconsistent with the idea that any such privilege existed or ever had existed.

Since the beginning of the Parliament the houses of Parliament have compelled their respective members to attend as witnesses before their committees. I quote from what is perhaps the highest authority, Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, page 523:

"There has been no instance of a member persisting in a refusal to give evidence; but members have been ordered by the house to attend select committees. * * * On the 28th of June, 1842, a committee reported that a member had declined complying with their request for his attendance. A motion was made for ordering him to attend the committee and give evidence; but the member having at last expressed his willingness to attend, the motion was withdrawn."

I have taken occasion to examine the record with reference to this case. A Mr. Cochran, member from Bridport, was requested by a special committee of the House of Commons to appear as a witness before it. He declined on the ground that he was under indictment in his district; that the record of his testimony before the committee might be sent down, etc.; that the proceedings before the committee were in secret session; and claiming that under these circumstances it would be violative of his general rights as an Englishman to compel him to appear before the special committee. The committee moved the house to order him to appear.

In the debate upon that motion the question was also raised as to the precedents, whether a member of Commons was to be compelled to testify as a witness. A committee was appointed to examine and report as to the precedents, and made a lengthy report, which I have also examined. In this report the committee stated that it had not found any instance in which any member of the house had refused to attend to be examined before any committee appointed by the house; that it had found one case, that of "Sir Archibald Grant, a member of the house, being committed to the custody of the sergeant at arms, in order to his forthcoming to abide the orders of the house, for the purpose of his being examined before a select committee." Most of the cases reported upon were those in which the member had been ordered by the house to attend. The following quotation from the report indicates what seems to have been the usual procedure:

"Jovis, 19 die Januarii, 1720. The master of the rolls acquainted the house, from the committee of secrecy, that he was directed by the said committee to move the house that Sir Robert Chaplin, Sir Theodore Janssen, Francis Eyles, Esq., and Jacob Sawbridge, Esq., four of the directors of the South Sea Co., and members of this house, may attend the said committee and be examined before them, in the most solemn manner."

"Ordered, That Sir Robert Chaplin, baronet; Sir Theodore Janssen, knight and baronet; Francis Eyles, Esq., and Jacob Sawbridge, Esq., members of this house, and directors of the South Sea Co., do attend the committee appointed to inquire into all the proceedings relating to the execution of the act passed the last session of Parliament, intitled * * * (Vol. 19, p. 403.) (Vol. 97, H. of Com. Journal, p. 450.)"

After examining the report, and evidently anticipating the order of the Commons, Mr. Cochran said—I quote from the Journal of the House of Commons:

"* * * having looked at the precedents and finding that they tended against the views he had originally taken * * * said he had no objection to repeating that he intended to attend."

There was extensive debate had on this matter, some half dozen speeches being reported, including a speech by Mr. Cochran. Neither Mr. Cochran nor anyone else claimed the existence of a privilege under the law of Parliament which a member could avail himself of as against the order of the House of Commons. That was the law of Parliament at the time of the adoption of our Constitution. Not only did such construction attach itself to our Constitution by reason of our adoption of that which for hundreds of years had borne that construction, but an examination of our Constitution shows that only as thus construed does the provision as to arrest of Members of Congress fit into our constitutional structure.

For instance, the Constitution provides that each House may "punish its Members for disorderly behavior." A construction which holds the provision as to arrest not to be operative against the Houses of Congress, just as in Great Britain at the time of the adoption of our Constitution it was not operative against the houses of Parliament, would leave the Houses of Congress with the implied power to arrest as an incident to the preservation of order and the punishment for disorderly behavior, a power essential for the discharge of the public business.

On the other hand, if held operative against the Houses of Congress, the words "in all cases" and the enumeration of the exceptions, "treason, felony, and breach of the peace," would interpose a double negative against the power of the Houses of Congress to arrest for disorderly conduct.

The Supreme Court in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 189) indicates very clearly that it does not regard the clause of the Constitution with reference to arrest operative against the Houses of Congress. In a discussion of the power of the Houses of Congress it says:

"As we have already said, the Constitution expressly empowers each House to punish its own Members for disorderly behavior. We see no reason to doubt that this punishment may in a proper case be imprisonment, and that it may be for refusal to obey some rule on that subject made by the House for the preservation of order."

The only theory under which that holding could rest is the rational, historically supported theory that the freedom from arrest clause is not operative in favor of the Member against the House of which he is a Member. The Member of Congress, when summoned by the House of which he is a Member to testify before one of its committees, proceeding within the scope of its jurisdiction, has exactly the status of any other witness. In an impeachment matter the Supreme Court, in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson, says:

"The House of Representatives has the sole right to impeach officers of the Government and the Senate to try them. Where the question of such impeachment is before either body acting in its appropriate sphere on that subject, we see no reason to doubt the right to compel the attendance of witnesses, and their answer to proper questions, in the same manner and by the use of the same means that courts of justice can in like cases."

It may be observed that the more recent decisions draw the distinction between the power to punish for contempt held by courts of justice and the power held by the Houses of Congress to coerce, by punishment, as an aid to procuring testimony.

Considering parliamentary privileges generally, we find that they had their origin in the days when the Houses of Parliament, and especially the Commons, were fighting the battles of English liberty against the tyranny of the King. They built around themselves this wall of privilege, beyond which the governmental agencies directly under the control of the King could not reach. It was their domain. No other agency of the Government might enter. There they denounced tyranny and held the purse string of the nation. Their maxim, in effect, was that whatever matter arose within their wall was to be settled there and nowhere else. Whatever was said there could not be questioned elsewhere. They made their own laws of procedure, construed them, and enforced them. They fixed the qualifications of their members and passed upon their election. They expelled whomsoever they adjudged worthy of expulsion, answerable to no authority whatsoever.

In not one single instance has the construction of the judiciary or the coercion of the executive been permitted within that realm of exclusive jurisdiction. The idea now presented, that in this matter between the House and one of its own Members, developed during the discharge of its duty under the impeachment clause of the Constitution, that one of the two great laws of parliamentary privileges fashioned to exclude judicial and executive interference, gives to the individual Member of Congress the power to open the door, barred from the beginning against the judiciary, and to draw that branch of the Government into the very center of that which has always been the exclusive domain of the Houses of Congress and of their predecessors, the Houses of Parliament, is a most remarkable proposition. It is in direct conflict with law and precedent. It is violative of the purpose and the philosophy of parliamentary privilege.

The framers of the Constitution wisely left the adjustment of all conflicts between the representative duties of the Member and his duty to contribute any facts in his possession to the inquisitorial agencies of the House of which he is a Member, where they found it in the English system, viz, with the House of which he is a Member, the only tribunal qualified to adjust such conflict. In the House of which one is a Member, each individual Member has a personal interest in preventing the establishment of a precedent which would militate against the opportunity of the Member to represent his constituents in legislation, and yet each Member is also directly interested in promoting the efficiency of that House. And it is a fact, in so far as I have been able to discover from an examination of precedents and the history of parliamentary and congressional procedure, that during the entire legislative history of the American Congress and of the British Parliament there has been no scandal or circumstances indicating a wanton or inconsiderate exercise of the power which has always been held by the Houses of Parliament and of Congress to determine and adjust conflicts of duty, so as to safeguard the interests of constituencies and at the same time procure for the general public benefit facts peculiarly within the possession of the Member.

These considerations, supported by an unbroken line of policy and procedure dealing with the question of privilege extending back through the entire history of this country and into the parliamentary history of England for hundreds of years, would seem to leave no doubt as to the soundness of the conclusions that the individual Member of Congress possesses no constitutional privilege as against the power of the House, proceeding even to the point of arrest, sought to be exercised to compel him to testify before a committee of the House of which he is a Member, proceeding within the scope of its jurisdiction.

Undoubtedly circumstances and conditions may develop under which a Member should be privileged from testifying with regard to certain matters. It would seem clearly so with regard to confidential communications, and the names of informants, with regard to governmental matters; so that all those who may know facts of public importance which should be imparted will not be deterred from approaching a Member by fear of forced breach of confidence and resultant hurt from their superiors. Members ought not to be required, it would seem, to attend a committee during a session of their respective Houses at any point other than at the seat of government, and there not during the time when their respective Houses are actually engaged. A better practice would be, in the first instance, to request the Member to attend. In the event of his failure or refusal, the committee should move the House to order him to attend. On that motion all questions could be considered and passed upon rather than later, after the Member had, at least technically, assumed an attitude of contempt.

Under any plan the genius of our system of government requires that those matters be determined by the House of which one is a Member, free from interference by either of the other branches of the Government. These suggestions, however, are merely those which have occurred to me during an examination of this matter, with the certainty of judgment that each House alone has jurisdiction to consider and act with reference thereto.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] consumed all his time?

The SPEAKER. All but 10 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. The gentleman from Minnesota and myself agreed to extend the time an hour, making two hours on a side, instead of an hour and a half.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware of that. Perhaps that is a matter that had better be agreed upon by the House.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] suggests that he has made an agreement with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] that the debate shall be four hours instead of three hours.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; there was some talk between the gentleman and myself in regard to extending the time an hour, but—

Mr. THOMAS. That is what I understood the gentleman to say right over there.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did not so understand.

Mr. THOMAS. If I understand the English language the gentleman said it. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. But I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he will now agree to an extension of one hour.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, did the House agree to extend the time?

The SPEAKER. It did not. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the members of the Committee on the Judiciary that the coon which they are after is not up the tree around which the barking is taking place, but it is elsewhere. The Bible says:

And they hanged Haman upon the scaffold which he had erected for Mordecai.

That is good logic; that is good law; and I am in favor of it. But the Bible does not say that they hanged somebody else. It says, "They hanged Haman." It does not say that they hanged some little carpenter that helped to build the scaffold for Haman. They hanged Haman. Mr. KELLER is not the Haman we are after.

Why, the very minute that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] appeared before the committee, he asked if he could have an attorney, which was granted, and when somebody kept talking to him and consulting with him the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] said:

Who is it that keeps talking to you, Mr. KELLER? I do not know—

Mr. KELLER said. But the man who had been talking to KELLER said—

I am Mr. McGrady. I appear here for the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Gompers is in Atlantic City, but he will be here next week, and we can go on with the proceeding when he comes back next week.

To be exact, let me quote from page 5 of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, to wit:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean that we are to furnish you an attorney? Mr. KELLER. No; I will furnish my own attorney. I just want to be permitted to have counsel, as I see fit, at any time.

And I quote again from page 13 of the hearings:

Mr. DYER. Has the gentleman consulted an attorney in regard to this matter?

Mr. KELLER. I should want counsel.

Mr. DYER. Who was the gentleman who just spoke to you?

Mr. KELLER. I do not know.

Mr. MCGRADY. I am Mr. McGrady, representing the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. DYER. I wanted to know who you were.

Mr. MCGRADY. I would like to finish my statement. The American Federation of Labor has asked to be heard on this case. President Gompers, with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, is at Atlantic City to-day, but will be here next week. We have already made a request to be heard.

Thus you see, gentlemen, that Mr. Samuel Gompers and the great American Federation of Labor sent one of their distinguished attorneys there to represent Mr. KELLER, when Mr. KELLER did not even know who he was, and the attorney had to introduce himself, though he had up to that time been conferring with Mr. KELLER during the hearing. It was the voice of Mr. KELLER but the hand of Mr. Samuel Gompers.

And then, a little later, Mr. Jackson H. Ralston, the general attorney for the American Federation of Labor, but who is known far and wide in the United States as the friend and attorney of prominent anarchists, appeared before the Judiciary Committee at the beginning of its first main hearing, December 4, 1922, as the attorney for Mr. KELLER, and proceeded thereafter to conduct the hearings. And it was admitted before the committee that Mr. Ralston was employed by Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor for that specific purpose.

To show that Mr. Ralston exercised absolute control as the attorney for the American Federation of Labor, let me read an excerpt from page 173 of the hearings to show that when Samuel Gompers desired to make further statements the Federation of Labor's attorney tried to muzzle him, to wit:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have anything further?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RALSTON. I think that is all.

To show you what Attorney Ralston was trying to head off, let me quote from page 174 of the hearings, to wit:

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Burns was engaged to assist the Government in the McNamara case, wasn't he?

Mr. GOMPERS. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. HOWLAND. You took a decided interest in those cases for the McNamaras, didn't you?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir. I took an interest to see that men would have a fair trial, no matter what they were charged with—what charges were made against them.

Mr. HOWLAND. You took the position that they were not guilty?

Mr. GOMPERS. I believed them not guilty, and so stated that I believed them not to be guilty.

Mr. HOWLAND. And they afterwards confessed?

It will be remembered that the McNamara brothers were bomb-throwing anarchists, who were brought to justice through the efforts of Mr. Burns, and convicted, and also that Samuel Gompers raised a tremendous fund in their behalf by soliciting subscriptions from all over the country for their defense.

Now, let me quote from page 175 of the hearings:

Mr. HOLLAND. Does Mr. Ralston represent the American Federation of Labor in this proceeding?

Mr. GOMPERS. He does.

When Mr. KELLER was summoned before the committee to testify, he did not appear. Who appeared for him? Mr. Jackson H. Ralston? No. This great attorney for the American Federation of Labor had an engagement that morning to play a round of golf with Mr. Gompers, very probably, or at least he had something on foot that made it inconvenient for him to attend the hearings that day, so he sent one of his sub-attorneys. Who? Why, he sent Mr. James H. Vahey, a renowned labor attorney from Boston, who came all the way from New England to act as a messenger boy for Attorney Ralston. This is the same Mr. James H. Vahey who represents the striking railroad men of New England, who represents the striking policemen of Boston who tried to ruin that great city. He appeared and told the committee that he did not bring Mr. KELLER, that he did not bring Chief Ralston, but that he brought merely a letter from the Right Hon. Jackson H. Ralston conveying information to the committee that as soon as it was convenient for him to do so he would appear and then advise the committee what he was going to let Mr. KELLER do about the summons from the House of Representatives.

Let me quote from page 363 of the hearings, to wit:

FRIDAY, December 15, 1922.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD (chairman) presiding.

IN RE SUBPENA OF HON. O. E. KELLER.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. A subpoena was issued yesterday, at the direction of the committee, for OSCAR E. KELLER to appear here this morning to testify, and I understand that the subpoena has been served. The Chair asks if he is present. If he is, we want him to come forward and be sworn.

Mr. VAHEY. Mr. Chairman, I am asked by Mr. Ralston to hand you a letter.

Mr. MICHENER. Just a minute, so that the record may be complete. Please state your name, occupation, and residence.

STATEMENT OF MR. JAMES H. VAHEY, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. VAHEY. My name is James H. Vahey, a lawyer, and I live in Boston.

Mr. MICHENER. Were you one of the attorneys named by Mr. Ralston at the beginning who would represent Mr. KELLER on certain specifications here?

Mr. VAHEY. I do not know whether he named me or not; I was not here until day before yesterday; that was the first day I was here.

Mr. MICHENER. He mentioned you as representing Mr. KELLER on some of these specifications. Now, do you appear on behalf of Mr. KELLER?

Mr. VAHEY. I am associated with Mr. Ralston by bringing here and delivering to the chairman the letter, at Mr. Ralston's suggestion.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the record should show that at the request of Mr. Ralston Mr. Vahey is here, and I think it is pertinent to ask if he appears as counsel of record for Mr. KELLER; and if so, state it.

Mr. VAHEY. I appear at the request of Mr. Ralston to deliver a letter, which I have handed to the chairman.

Mr. BOIES. I assume the record will show there is no response by Mr. KELLER under the subpoena.

Mr. BIRD. Is Mr. Ralston in the city?

Mr. VAHEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I will read Mr. Ralston's letter to the committee [reading]:

RALSTON & WILLIS, ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS AT LAW,
EVANS BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1922.

Hon. A. J. VOLSTEAD,
Chairman Committee on Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Some time last evening Representative KELLER was served with a subpoena to appear before your committee at 10.30 o'clock this morning. I was immediately asked to represent him in the matter. Before this, however, I had made certain imperative business engagements for to-day, engagements which I can not forego. I have, therefore, to say that, without submitting at this time to the jurisdiction of the committee with regard to the subpoena, I am now expecting, at your next hearing, to-morrow or later, to take such position before the committee with regard to the subject as may seem appropriate.

Very respectfully yours,

JACKSON H. RALSTON.

And the committee supinely sat there, helpless, and my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who, thank God, has a backbone, said:

Gentlemen, there is just one thing to do. Let us go to the House and get authority to make this man come. We do not want Vahey, from Boston; we do not want Ralston, from Washington; we want KELLER.

The committee would not back him up; but the committee adjourned to a time when it would not be inconvenient for Mr. Jackson H. Ralston to appear before them, and let me quote from page 380 of the hearings to show what then happened, to wit:

IN RE SUBPENA OF HON. OSCAR E. KELLER.

Mr. RALSTON. I think as a matter of courtesy I should be heard for a moment.

Mr. GRAHAM. Where is Mr. KELLER? He ought to be here with you if you are heard.

Mr. THOMAS. Can't he be heard at all?

Mr. GRAHAM. Pardon me; I am not addressing you.

Mr. THOMAS. It don't make any difference. I am on this committee as well as you are.

Mr. GRAHAM. I appreciate that, but do not interrupt me when I am asking a question.

Mr. THOMAS. You interrupted him.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a right to. That is my privilege.

Mr. THOMAS. And I have a right to interrupt you.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, do not let us have any altercation about it. I am here to do my duty as I see it.

Mr. THOMAS. So am I.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, I give you credit for that, but you may not see clearly.

Now, I ask, is Mr. KELLER here, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Can you answer, Mr. Ralston?

Mr. RALSTON. I am here for Mr. KELLER.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is not an answer. He ought to be here. I object to proceeding without his presence.

Mr. RALSTON. I have a statement to make for myself.

Mr. HERSEY. I want to hear Mr. Ralston.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I move that we hear Mr. Ralston.

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Chairman, I think the simple fact should be established for the record that Mr. KELLER is not here. I think the sergeant at arms should call him, and if he is not here I think we should then hear Mr. Ralston.

The CHAIRMAN. My impression about it is we should first hear Mr. Ralston, and if we want to hear Mr. KELLER we can call him.

Mr. BIRD. You do not object to the record showing that Mr. KELLER is not here?

Mr. RALSTON. I don't care anything about that. I am here for him.

Mr. GRAHAM. I move that he be called.

Mr. BIRD. I ask that the sergeant at arms call Mr. KELLER.

The CHAIRMAN. All those in favor of that motion will say "aye," opposed "no."

(The motion was put and carried. The sergeant at arms called "OSCAR E. KELLER," "OSCAR E. KELLER," "OSCAR E. KELLER." There was no response.)

The CHAIRMAN. It may be noted that he did not answer. Now, Mr. Ralston, you may proceed.

Mr. RALSTON. On behalf of Mr. KELLER I have simply this brief statement to make, that I have advised Mr. KELLER, on his application to me, that in the issuance of process requiring his appearance, he being a Member of Congress, with the implied threat, of course, that lies behind the process, the committee has, in my judgment, exceeded its powers under the constitutional provisions, and that being true, in defense of the rights of Members of Congress, as well as for other reasons, Mr. KELLER can not be required by any such process to appear before this committee.

And it then took the great Judiciary Committee of this House from December 16, 1922, until this the 25th day of January, 1923, to bring on the floor of this House any kind of a report. And what is their report? This is what they tell this Congress, for you, colleagues, should know, and I quote as follows:

That the said OSCAR E. KELLER was, as above set forth, duly summoned as a witness by authority of the House of Representatives to give testimony before this committee touching matters of inquiry committed to that committee, and that he willfully made default in that in disobedience to said subpoena and without valid cause or excuse, but in contempt of the authority of the House of Representatives, he willfully failed and refused to appear as such witness and willfully failed and refused to testify, in obedience to said subpoena. Your committee is of the opinion that Mr. KELLER was legally required to obey said subpoena and that the excuse he submitted through his said attorney is without any merit; that the House of Representatives possesses the power to cause him to be arrested and confined in prison until he shall consent to testify, such confinement not to extend beyond the term of this Congress, and power to otherwise deal with him so as to compel obedience to the summons.

Does the committee ask for the House to do anything? No; not at all. Do they ask for the House to compel KELLER to do what they say he should do? No; not at all. They make no recommendations whatever. They take it all out in speeches on the floor denouncing KELLER as a falsifier but letting it go at that. They are after the catspaw of somebody else. If KELLER falsified, somebody else caused him to do it. Why is not the main power condemned?

Behind the whole thing is the use of KELLER, the poor, little, innocent dupe of somebody else. I am not in favor of hanging the carpenter who built the scaffold. I am after Haman. [Applause.] When Jackson H. Ralston told KELLER that the American Federation of Labor told him to tell him that he did not have to testify the committee ought to have proceeded against Jackson H. Ralston and his little messenger lawyer from Boston, because there are lawyers on this Judiciary Committee, there are ex-judges on this committee, there are prosecuting attorneys on this great committee. They know that when an outside person interferes with the jurisdiction of a court—and that is the jurisdiction which this committee had—the party on the outside who interferes with a witness and designedly keeps him from giving proper testimony is more guilty than the witness who violates the order of the court; and if they would bring in here a resolution asking this House to send for Ralston and send for Vahey and send for McGrady and send for Gompers, and have them bring their little dupe in here, I would vote to take action against them first and then to make their dupe testify, because it is what he ought to do. I would take such action against these fellows who have interfered with the jurisdiction of this House as would cause them to hesitate long in the future before they would again interfere with the great legislative body of this Nation.

But we are here hanging merely the carpenter on Haman's scaffold. What is the matter with this great committee? What made it hesitate to do its duty? Why does it linger and linger and linger? I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] that he of all other people in the world ought not ever to talk about passing the buck. Let me again call your attention to what Mr. Ralston said.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Did the gentleman say "buck" or "bock"? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. B-u-c-k, "buck," commonly known to most Members of Congress. [Laughter.]

Poor KELLER! He has my sympathy. He has been the dupe. He came here to represent organized labor. That is the danger of any Representative being sent here by a class. Why, the Republicans did not elect him in Minnesota. The Democrats did not elect him. Organized labor elected him and sent him here. He was merely representing the organizations who sent him here. They handed him a bag, the contents of which he knew nothing. He had confidence in them. Organized labor told him, "In that bag is sufficient evidence to impeach the great Attorney General of the United States," and he conscientiously believed them; but when he opened this bag he found just what I told the Speaker was in Mr. KELLER's impeachment resolution, nothing but generalities; and if the Speaker had sustained my point of order that I made on September 11 in this House, all this farce would not have been enacted.

Here is what happened on September 11, 1922, when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] presented to the House his charges of impeachment, and I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the recitation of generalities does not under the rules of this House constitute an impeachment of a public official; that this recitation is nothing but generalities, no specific charge of malfeasance in office, no specific charge of improper conduct in office, but a mere recitation of generalities which could be lodged against any official of the United States. I make the point of order that it does not come within the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not hear the gentleman from Minnesota very well, but the Chair thought that there were definite charges. [After examining the written charges.] The Chair overrules the point of order.

And when the Judiciary Committee first began its consideration of the matter the chairman of that committee took the same view, that such charges were too general and were not specific, as required, for I quote from the hearings, on page 7, the following:

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in them except general charges.

Mr. KELLER. I am ready to sustain them—

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing specific in the charges.

And the chairman then required Mr. KELLER to file specific charges, which took up many pages of the hearings.

But when poor KELLER opened up his bag, which organized labor handed him, it would not furnish the evidence. If there had been no railroad strike there would not have been any proposed impeachment. If there had been no injunction against lawbreakers there would have been no proposed impeachment. On that question I am with the Attorney General in his action in stopping the anarchy which Samuel H. Ralston, the anarchist attorney who appeared here and conducted this examination, has been defending, which Vahey has been defending. I am with the Attorney General in upholding the law of this country, but I am not going to persecute a poor little dupe like my colleague, KELLER. I am going after the ones higher up, and I think you ought to do the same thing. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended one hour, one half of it to be controlled by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of debate be extended one hour, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has used 50 minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] has used 48 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will take as little time as possible, so as to leave as much for others as will be comprehended within the extension. Replying to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], I will only say that the splendid answer of the other gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] covers the ground and his objections most thoroughly. I recommend to every Member of the House who is interested in such matters the careful perusal of the very able paper prepared by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas and presented to our committee upon this question of constitutional right. I have no manner of doubt whatever that the House has the power and has always exercised the power to subpoena any Member and have him testify and, if necessary, compel him to testify.

Briefly, I may say that the provisions of the Constitution which have been quoted here are for the protection of the House, and all history shows that, and not for the protection of the Members. In the old days they could take the Members out and leave the House without a quorum and destroy its power. Members should be free from arrest. That was to prevent external interference. But when you come to the internal operations of the power of the House, as Mr. SUMNERS so clearly shows, the House has full and complete power over its Members. And to say that when the House subpoenas a man and tells him to testify, and he does not, that he is not contumacious, disorderly, violating the honor and the dignity of the House, is to argue a negative that can not be sustained.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; surely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I inquire of the gentleman why it is that all of the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, in discussing this question, seem to be giving their entire time to Mr. KELLER rather than telling us why the resolution for the impeachment of the Attorney General should not be considered?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am simply replying to an argument addressed to the House by a gentleman sitting near you who raised this question of constitutional power, and I think in its importance it overtops even the question of the impeachment of the Attorney General, the question of the power of this House over its Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The resolution—

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not yield further; I have only 10 minutes, and it is not fair to me to cut it down. I do not desire to discuss the constitutional power of the House further than to say that it is fully and completely answered, beyond criticism, by the subcommittee's report prepared by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Now, I ask the attention of the House very briefly to two and perhaps three things. This committee took up Mr. KELLER's resolution in a perfectly fair spirit. There was not a man on that committee that did not feel his responsibility as a Member of this House, as a lawyer, to handle this question according to law, and recognize the right of every man coming before that committee or involved in the investigation.

Very early in the proceedings, when we were trying to proceed in orderly regularity, objection was made to this method, objection was made to that, and, as the other gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has said, Mr. Ralston thrust himself to the front, and was determined to have certain specifications only heard. Simply for the purpose of ascertaining the truth we asked Mr. KELLER what objection he had to proceeding with the specifications in their order, and he said that he had different attorneys prepare them and he did not know the names of the witnesses, and so on. That led to inquiry. I am not giving the exact words, but the hearings will disclose them as to what he did not and what he did know. Some of us wanted to ascertain whether he knew anything upon which he took the solemn position he did of charging impeachment against a high officer of this Government.

We felt that when an individual takes that responsibility he ought to have some facts within his knowledge. It was disclosed by his answers that he had no knowledge whatever, and the testimony further shows when we proceeded on with it that he originally went to the Attorney General in a certain case and asked that that case be taken up and prosecuted, a case or allegations against the United Gas Improvement Co. of Philadelphia. He accompanied a gentleman by the name of Monad and they together made the demand. The Attorney General, without having an investigation made or previous knowledge of the facts, said certainly. He said one man has been removed from the investigation that had charge of it under another administration, and that man was immediately restored by the Attorney General and put in charge of it. Then the word came to the Attorney General that he was making a blunder; that he had been misled by these men and there was nothing in that case. It had been examined by two administrations before that. Attorney General Gregory was maligned and abused because he was charged with not going on with that same case, and Attorney General Palmer was brought under criticism concerning the investigation of it, but both of them rightfully turned it down.

The Attorney General said, "I will have an independent examination," and appointed a very eminent lawyer from Ohio to investigate it, whose report is on file with our committee and is a part of the records of the Department of Justice. That uninterested investigator found that this case was without any basis whatever, and that in point of fact it amounted to a persecution accompanied by an assault upon everybody that refused to do the will of these people.

That is the secret of this impeachment. Disappointed because the Attorney General refused to proceed further with it, these articles of impeachment were filed, and when you read them you will find nothing but glittering generalities. Our chairman and committee joined in making him come down to concrete accusations. Then it was that under the cover of Mr. KELLER other influences appeared on the scene, and an extensive series of charges and specifications were framed and when they came to try them they could not proceed with any evidence except upon one accusation, and what was that? They charged the Attorney General with having appointed Mr. Burns—who had been disapproved by Attorney General Wickersham and President Taft in a certain indirect manner nearly 20 years ago—not an impeachable offense; no lawyer would contend that; and they were permitted to go on with proof under that charge, and when the evidence was heard it showed that they wanted simply to blackguard the Attorney General and to attack Burns. Burns had been instrumental in making certain arrests, which Mr. Gompers objected to, and Burns was obnoxious to him. Gompers appeared and tried to testify against Burns, but failed to establish a single fact that reflected upon the honor or integrity of Burns. When Burns came to the stand to testify he absolutely refuted the whole story and showed that there was no ground to support the inference drawn by Attorney General Wickersham and President Taft from the report made to them by Pardon Attorney Finch.

I wish I had time to quote the testimony or a brief portion of it, for it is unanswerable. When he came to testify he explained that papers which were left there in that office, in Washington State, where the Jones case had been tried, were all left there when he gave up his connection with the case in any way in 1905. And mark you, this alleged misconduct concerning a selection of the jury was in 1905, and a prominent man in that State was indicted for land frauds. Burns was simply there as an inspector for the Government. That was in 1905. Jones was tried and convicted. Sentence was suspended. In 1911 an application was made for his pardon just preceding a presidential nomination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This was just preceding a presidential nomination. Mark you, this man although indicted and convicted, was never obliged to serve one single day in the penitentiary—not a day. Sentence was suspended. The case had gone up to the highest court on appeal and had been confirmed both as to the fairness of the selection of the jury, the trial, and every incident in it. And yet that man never served a day in jail. Application was made for his pardon seven years after the conviction in the midst of a hot political campaign in which the delegation of his State was involved. Mr. Burns will show you that he never had a chance to answer the charge in any legal or formal way, and he will show you that the papers found supposedly in his handwriting were not in his handwriting at all. He will show you that the imputation that he has said certain things about jurors and the selection of them, and the evidence of it that had been left there, are utterly without foundation. The Attorney General knew this. He has the explanation and the truth from Burns, and when he made that appointment he exercised his right in selecting a man to fill this place. That was the whole strength of what they had to throw mud over Burns and get the revenge which they desired against this prominent official, and I say that if this proceeding has no other effect, in my opinion, it has one good effect, because it has shown the enmity of these very men, improperly substituted—no; properly substituted—by the gentleman from Texas, as the people who ought to be hanged. They tried to get their revenge on Burns even if they struck down the Attorney General. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the matter under discussion is the impeachment resolution concerning Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States. I am not acquainted with the Attorney General. If I ever saw him, I am not aware of it. I never spoke to Mr. KELLER, who preferred the charges, and never knew him until he appeared before the Judiciary Committee in this case. I have no bias whatever in this matter, and I come to discuss it at least with clear vision, although some may think with faulty judgment, and perchance they may be correct, for we all have our faults and follies and human limitations. I would not intentionally do the Attorney General or the members of the committee who adopt his views of the case any wrong, nor do I impugn the motives of the committee, but I do condemn what seems to me to be their clouded judgment and the strange and unaccountable antipathy some of them seemed to have toward some witnesses and to some persons who did not testify, as well as the manner in which the inquiry was conducted. In discharging duties, especially of this character, we should be mindful of human frailties which are incident to all. Life at longest is short, and in dealing with our fellow men we should at least to some extent temper justice with mercy and do unto others as we would have them do unto us, for a human being is at best only a weak vessel drifting on tempestuous and uncharted seas toward far blind shores, and—

Break, break, break! the breakers roar
Till they lave some distant shore, and dash the helpless craft against the rocks and bury physical existence forever beneath wild waters.

While we should temper justice with mercy we must remember that such consideration is secondary to the public welfare and that the mantle of protection should first be thrown around the whole citizenship in preference to the individual, and with this view I shall discuss the questions at issue, without regard to individual desires, as fully as I can in the time allotted to me, and shall shoot as true to the mark as I possibly can, unmindful who may suffer.

This impeachment proceeding had its inception on the 7th day of last April and grew out of remarks made on the floor of this House by Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota and Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. JOHNSON, in the course of his remarks, stated that—

The facts I am going to show indisputably prove that the War Department has sold property and to-day is selling property at ridiculously and criminally low prices to favored customers, concealing the facts from Congress and deliberately misrepresenting the facts. They also show the War Department is trying to control the Department of Justice by putting men who ought to be in the penitentiary on the Department of Justice pay roll and asking Congress to appropriate for it.

On that occasion Mr. JOHNSON further stated:

Mr. WOODRUFF and myself have performed our full duty in presenting this matter to the Congress. The duty now devolves upon you gentlemen and the President. We need no investigation if the Government will function, and an investigation will be worse than useless if it is conducted with some of these men now in power in control of the records.

And he further stated:

My only object in presenting this matter at this time is to show its relation with invisible government.

Mr. JOHNSON then proceeded to enumerate a great number of war frauds—an hundred or more—by which the Government lost many millions of dollars, and charged that no steps had been taken to punish the criminals or recover the money.

His charges, made on the floor of the House, were made known to the members of the Judiciary Committee. It is the duty, as the committee well knows, of the Attorney General to investigate and prosecute all of the offenders in all such matters. Mr. JOHNSON was politely requested by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to appear before the committee, and if he knew—of any witnesses that can substantiate any of the charges, I wish you would give the committee the names of such witnesses so that I may be able to subpoena them and have them appear.

To this invitation Mr. JOHNSON responded and stated he would appear; if the committee desires he would submit a list of witnesses, including Army officers and civil accountants, who, in his opinion, will substantiate every statement made to the House, and would also submit a list of records in the War Department which the committee may have brought before it, and that it was a pleasure to him to know that the Judiciary Committee desires to go into these matters thoroughly and that he would be glad to cooperate in every way and proffered his services to cross-examine the witnesses. (Hearings, p. 412.)

Mr. JOHNSON appeared before the committee and reiterated that he could produce witnesses to substantiate every charge he had made on the 7th of the preceding April. The committee did not request him to furnish a list of witnesses or a single witness or record. It evaded the matter under the flimsy pretext that the charges made by Mr. JOHNSON were not embraced in the specifications filed by Mr. KELLER. This, of course, was the merest pretext and showed clearly, in my opinion, the committee's intention to exculpate the Attorney General.

The Resolution 425, passed by the House, authorized and directed the committee to inquire into the official conduct of the Attorney General to determine whether he had been guilty of any acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors. The resolution did not authorize nor direct a trial of charges against the Attorney General, and this fact was well known to the committee. The resolution did not authorize nor direct the committee to inquire into some of the official conduct of the Attorney General but to inquire into his official conduct, which meant any official conduct, and report to the House whether in its opinion he had been guilty of any acts, not some acts, which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes and misdemeanors. It is a vain thing and sophistry in a circle of the most apparent kind to contend that the committee had the right to require Mr. KELLER to file specifications and then confine itself to evidence as to those specific charges without the privilege of amending or extending the charges. There is not a judge of a court in America who knows any law whatever who would deny a litigant the privilege of filing an amended petition containing a material allegation. The resolution is to inquire into the official conduct of the Attorney General, and had the committee been mindful of its duty or had realized its obligation it would have made a thorough inquiry into his official conduct regardless of specifications, giving him, of course, due notice of and every opportunity of defense.

The numerous cases of war graft presented by Mr. JOHNSON related to the official conduct of the Attorney General. The Attorney General certainly knew of the charges, and if he did not it is inconceivable that he did not, and he did beyond any doubt know of them since the 7th of April, the day Mr. JOHNSON publicly made them on the floor of the House. It was his plain duty under the law to have investigated and prosecuted these cases, but he has not done so, and no reason or excuse has been given why he has failed in this duty, and the committee conveniently determined not to summons the witnesses, excusing itself because these matters were not contained in KELLER's specifications, when if it had considered specifications necessary and done its duty it would have amended the specifications, subpoenaed the witnesses, and investigated the charges.

Some of the committee, when the inquiry or whatever it may be termed was being conducted, seemed imbued with the idea that an impeachable offense must also be an indictable offense. Whether that was a feeble attempt to protect the Attorney General I do not know, but that contention was soon abandoned, as it has never been the law in any civilized country. It was never the law in England and—

In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the United States Senate in which convictions resulted the offenders were found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute. (A. and E. Enc. of Law, vol. 15, p. 1067.)

And none of the articles exhibited against United States Judge Archbald, of Pennsylvania, on which he was impeached charged an indictable offense or violation of positive law.

One of the complaints against the Attorney General is that he appointed William J. Burns Chief of the Bureau of Investigations when he knew before the appointment was made that Burns was an unfit person and an improper character to be appointed. This charge was based in part on the conviction of Willard N. Jones for being concerned in the Oregon land frauds in 1905. Jones was pardoned by President Taft on the recommendation of Attorney General Wickersham, because Mr. Taft believed from the evidence presented that Jones's conviction was obtained through the activities of Burns in succeeding in stuffing the trial jury box by himself and agents with jurymen he ascertained in advance were for conviction.

In his recommendation to President Taft for pardon of Mr. Jones, Mr. Wickersham stated:

The course of the Executive seems to me to be clear, and that is, he can not countenance the methods employed in the prosecution of these cases.

In granting the pardon, Mr. Taft wrote Mr. Wickersham:

From the case made it is perfectly clear that this conviction was effected by the most barefaced and unfair use of all the machinery for drawing a jury that has been disclosed to me in all my experience in the Federal court. (Hearings, pp. 141-143.)

Some members of the committee used every effort to keep this evidence from being made a part of the record. (Hearings, pp. 141-142.) They objected to it all, and they objected because they claimed that Attorney General Daugherty did not have any knowledge of the existence of this evidence before he appointed Burns, but it was shown by several witnesses, including Mr. Wickersham, that he did have complete knowledge of all the evidence bearing on the Jones case, and it was finally admitted by Mr. Daugherty's attorney.

The next move in the defense of Daugherty by the committee in the Burns matter was to try to make it appear that Mr. Wickersham had signed the recommendation for the pardon of Jones as a mere matter of form and had not given his personal attention to the papers in the case, and that Mr. Taft had signed the pardon merely on the recommendation of Mr. Wickersham. This illusion, however, was dispelled by the testimony of Mr. Wickersham, who stated:

I gave it very careful attention.

I went over the report very carefully.

I personally examined all the documents referred to in the case. (Hearings, p. 178.)

Mr. Wickersham testified that Burns never came to see him in defense of his action, although he sent for him to do so, but that he was informed he called only once at the Department of Justice in Mr. Wickersham's absence.

Burns sent a telegram in cipher to Hon. E. A. Hitchcock, at that time Secretary of the Interior, on August 17, 1905, the very date on which the jury box was filled in the Jones case, which was as follows:

Jury commissioners cleaned out old box from which trial jurors were selected and put 600 new names, every one of which was investigated before they were placed in the box. This is confidential. (Hearings, p. 140.)

Burns was in charge of Oregon land-fraud cases. The hearings show that he had agents in the field investigating possible jurors to determine who were for conviction. Inadvertently he seems to have left the telegram and other papers in the case in the office of the district attorney, where they were discovered in the old jury box. Burns states that when he returned to Portland he found Thomas B. Newhausen in charge of the investigation of the jurors, and he further states we had been making investigation of the jurors from the time we first went up there in what they designate here as the "old jury box."

Afterwards Burns was asked by Daugherty's attorney if you meant to say that these men were investigated by you, and he replied, "Oh, not at all." Then later Burns stated we continued to investigate. So he first states we—that is, Burns and others—had been making investigations; then he denied that these jurors had been investigated by him, and then capped the climax of his contradictory statements by declaring, "We continued to investigate." Annotations were made opposite the names of the jurors investigated, such as "convictor from word go." "Socialist anti-Mitchell." "Just read the indictment." "Think he is a populist. If so, convictor." "Would be apt to be for conviction." "He is apt to wish Mitchell hung." "Would convict Christ." "Convict anyone." Burns's favorite way of describing an unsatisfactory juror was to designate him as — of —. Burns states in his testimony—that the jury was selected after being investigated by jury commissioner and clerks of the court. (Hearings, p. 229.)

But his statement is contradicted by Judge Gilbert, who tried the case. Judge Gilbert, in letters, states:

All orders on which names were placed were made by me. I know of my own knowledge that no men were sent out to ascertain the views or inclination of any of the men so selected. I was advised of each step taken by the commissioner in making the jury lists. (Hearings, p. 169.)

So Burns's statement that the jury was selected after being investigated by the clerks and jury commissioner is contradicted by Judge Gilbert.

Corroboration of Burns's methods in the Jones case is the Beekman case in New Jersey. Beekman was charged with "running whisky" and Burns sent a man named Joyce, a deputy United States marshal, to New Jersey to obtain evidence against Beekman. Joyce remained several days in New Jersey but failed to obtain any evidence. Joyce undertook to explain the matter to Burns, but Burns told him it was his—

Plain duty over there to take that — of a — before the grand jury in Newark and have him indicted. I told him I did not think so. He said I had no business of looking into the matter of witnesses of the ones that made the affidavit; it was none of — business. Thereupon he flew into a rage and told me it was none of my — business, that it was my plain duty to have those witnesses before the grand jury in Newark and have this man indicted, which was afterwards done. (Hearings, pp. 255-256.)

Joyce further stated that he afterwards learned the reputation of the two witnesses on whom Burns relied and stated:

The very worst I think I ever heard. Neither of them would be believed on oath according to the very many men I talked with, business and professional men in that section. (Hearings, p. 256.)

Mr. McARTHUR, formerly connected with investigations of the Oregon land-fraud case, afterwards speaker of the House of Representatives of Oregon, and now an honored Member of this House, made a complete disclosure of Burns' activities in the Jones case. He states that on or about July 25, 1905—the jury box was filled August 17, 1905—Burns telephoned to him that he wished to see him in the district attorney's office, and while there, in the presence of Francis J. Heney, Burns handed him a typewritten list and said, as nearly as Mr. McARTHUR can remember:

Here, Mac, is a list of prospective jurors from several counties. Take it and weed out the — of — who will not vote for conviction and return it to me as soon as possible, for we are going to make up a new jury box, and no man's name goes into the jury box unless we know he will convict, for, by —, we are going to get Williamson this time, you can bet your sweet life, and we will send this whole — outfit to jail, where they belong. We are going to stack the cards on them this time. (Hearings, p. 140.)

Mr. McARTHUR became indignant and told Burns that such methods were altogether improper, and that no self-respecting man could be a party to them, and Burns replied:

Any methods are justifiable in dealing with these — of —. (Hearings, p. 140.)

McARTHUR further states that about the 1st of September, 1905, he met Burns, who said to him:

Well, Mac, we weeded out the — of —; at least, I think we did, and we will get Williamson this time, and, by —, we will get the whole — crowd. (Hearings, p. 140.)

And he further states that Burns said:

Old Slayden kicked like — because my men worked the lists over before they went to the jury commissioners, but it didn't do the old — of — any good, as the corrected lists went in, anyhow.

Burns stated in his testimony that Jones paid for his pardon, but did not say who he paid nor how much he paid, but intimated that the price was that the Oregon delegates to the national convention should go instructed for Roosevelt but should vote for Taft, thereby attempting to besmirch the good name of Mr. Taft to save himself and Daugherty. All the evidence in this case, in my opinion, shows beyond a reasonable doubt that Burns and his agents packed the jury box with jurors they knew would convict Willard N. Jones.

In the Burns matter the committee permitted Senator JOHNSON, of California, to testify as a character witness for Burns without in anyway qualifying as such witness. He stated he knew Burns when he was investigating the graft cases in San Francisco and was permitted to tell his own personal estimate of him, which anyone knows was not competent testimony. JOHNSON stated he would believe Burns before he would Mr. Wickersham, but at the suggestion of some of the committee he qualified that by saying it was because he did not know Wickersham but knew Burns. By a parity of reasoning I presume Senator JOHNSON would state that he would believe Burns before he would Christ because he knows Burns but never knew Christ.

The pious soul of one of the committee was horrified because in the course of his investigation of the Beekman case Joyce was compelled to visit a number of saloons in order to try to obtain evidence, and he accused Joyce, in Daugherty's defense of course, that while in saloons he found it necessary to take a few drinks of whisky; and he accused Joyce of violating the law, about which there is a difference of opinion, and in behalf of Daugherty heckled Joyce all he possibly could. I presume the intelligent committeeman must have considered it Joyce's duty to visit a Sunday school in order to obtain evidence against a "whisky runner."

One of the charges brought against the Attorney General was that he failed to prosecute the railroads for violation of the safety appliance laws. His defense to that charge that he did not have sufficient funds to prosecute the railroads does not appear to be well taken, in view of the fact that he found sufficient funds to send agents all over the United States to ascertain whether any of the railway employees were violating the Chicago injunction.

The Attorney General also stated that he was not able to prosecute such cases because the railroad brotherhoods had failed to present him with evidence in those cases. This is a puerile excuse and the merest subterfuge to conceal his negligence and nonfeasance. The railroad brotherhoods were under no obligation whatever to furnish him with evidence of violations of the law. The Government has inspectors to investigate those matters and furnish evidence of violations of the law, and he well knew it when he made that excuse, and such evidence was furnished as shown by the testimony of Commissioner McChord. As a matter of fact, there was a great railway strike, which began the 1st of July; and the Attorney General hastened to Chicago September 1 and obtained the most far-reaching and oppressive injunction against the railway strikers ever obtained in the history of this Republic, while he permitted the violators of safety appliance laws to go unprosecuted.

As to the Attorney General's statement that he did not have funds sufficient to prosecute violators of the safety appliance laws, the following may be illuminating: On the 7th of April, 1922, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota offered to the appropriation bill providing for the expenses of the Attorney General an amendment appropriating $500,000 more for the expenses of the Attorney General's office, which was adopted and finally became law. Mr. HUSTEN, of New York, chairman of the subcommittee having in charge this appropriation bill, stated:

The Department of Justice has not asked for this item, but the Department of Justice is engaged in this work and has ample funds to carry it on at the present time. It does not need an additional dollar for this purpose, and if the money was appropriated it simply adds $500,000 to the amount carried in the bill which we would have to raise by taxation and which the department could put to no good purpose. (Hearings, p. 413.)

So the statement of the Attorney General that the violators of the safety appliance laws could not be prosecuted for lack of funds is evidently a defensive fabrication, and the Attorney General, as a further defensive smoke screen, asked for the appropriation of $500,000 about two weeks after Mr. JOHNSON had made his charges on the floor of the House on April 7.

According to the testimony of Commissioner McChord, the number of railway locomotives found defective from July to November, inclusive, was 18,976, and 2,890 locomotives were out of service. As a matter of course, the railroads had been continuously violating the law, or so many engines would not have been found defective nor such a number ordered out of service by the inspectors. Violators of this law were reported to the Attorney General August 15, 1922. Mr. McChord testified that he stated to the Attorney General in a letter that—

Certain violations of the act were reported to the Attorney General for appropriate legal action. With a continuance of existing conditions this will be increasingly frequent. (Hearings, p. 199.)

The President in his message to Congress stated that all laws to restrain conspiracies and to interfere with interstate commerce and the laws to insure the highest efficiency in the railroad service will be invoked, and the bill of the Attorney General in the Chicago injunction stated it is the duty of the Attorney General to enforce the safety appliance laws. He enjoined the employees but failed to prosecute the railroads, and instead protected the railroads by the most villainous injunction. So far as the evidence shows, he has never taken any steps to enforce the safety appliance laws. He has completely failed in his official capacity in this regard, has willfully neglected to perform his official duty, and is guilty of nonfeasance, an indictable and impeachable offense.

The lumber trusts have been continuously violating the antitrust law ever since and before Daugherty became Attorney General. The Federal Trade Commission placed the evidence of such violations in the hands of the Attorney General at various times ever since he has been in office, and yet he has made no effort to prosecute, and in that is guilty of nonfeasance and a willful neglect of duty. Evidence of the violation of the antitrust laws by the Southern Pine Association, the Western Pine Association, the Georgia-Florida Sawmill Association, the North Carolina Pine Association, the South Cypress Manufacturers' Association, the California Sugar and White Pine Manufacturers, the Redwood Manufacturers' Association, the California Redwood Association, the Redwood Shingle Association, the Northern Hemlock Manufacturers' Association, the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association was placed in the hands of the Attorney General, most of them nearly two years ago, yet he has taken no steps, so far as I am advised, to enforce the law. These companies are illegal combinations to enhance and maintain an exorbitant price for building material to the detriment of the public. No wonder there is a shortage of houses and many homeless people in this Republic with these illegal combinations operating in defiance of law with the tacit consent of the Attorney General. No wonder living becomes harder for poor people and the struggle for existence more acute when such oppression is carried on right under the nose of the Attorney General while he sits complacently by and, in plain violation of his duty, makes no effort to correct the evil.

In addition to these cases placed in the hands of the Attorney General evidence of a violation of the antitrust laws by the American Tobacco Co., National Implement and Vehicle Association, Macbeth-Evans Glass Co., Mathieson Alkali Works, Cumberland Manufacturing Co., National Malleable Castings Co., Maple Flooring Manufacturing Association, California Packing Corporation, Southern Wholesale Grocers Association, Duncan's Trade Register, Goodman Manufacturing Co., and the Pioneer Bindery Printing Co. was placed in his hands. The Attorney General has had the evidence in most all these cases ever since he has been in office and if he has ever made a move to prosecute any of these unlawful combinations I have never heard of it, but on the contrary he excuses himself by the statement that he is still investigating when all necessary evidence has long since been furnished by the Federal Trade Commission. His neglect of duty in these cases is the most willful nonfeasance and is of itself alone amply sufficient to call for his impeachment.

The committee had before it, or rather the chairman did, a statement from the Federal Trade Commission as early as December 25, 1922, that it had furnished the Attorney General with a statement of violations of law by these illegal combinations, giving the dates when such evidence was furnished, and Mr. KELLER in his specifications stated:

I request and demand that your committee require the production by the Department of Justice of all letters, telegrams, briefs, memoranda of conversations and conferences, reports of bureaus, investigators, agents, and all other papers, documents of any kind whatsoever in the files of the Department of Justice or of the said Harry M. Daugherty in connection with or in any matter related to any of the matters mentioned in this bill. (Hearings, p. 90.)

In addition to this Mr. KELLER requested that the committee have produced all documents and evidence in the Department of Justice that might throw light on the operations of 43 illegal combinations, including the evidence furnished by the Federal Trade Commission. He also requested that the documents and evidence concerning violations of law by the United Gas Improvement Co., Welsbach, Cities Illuminating Co., and a number of others be produced. The committee did not require the production of the files which Mr. KELLER claimed would prove his contention, but demanded of Mr. KELLER he should name just what papers he wanted, and did have produced some papers, but of such a character as to throw but little light on the situation, and it did not attempt, so far as I am aware, to have produced any of the evidence furnished the Attorney General by the Federal Trade Commission, although requested to do so, but contented itself by stating that the Attorney General would furnish any paper called for and ended by stating that Mr. KELLER refused to offer any evidence, in the face of the fact that in his specifications he had called for various documents which the committee refused to have produced.

The statement made on the floor of the House this day that the Attorney General was willing to produce any record does not correspond to the facts. In his answer to the Keller specifications calling for various documents, naming them, the Attorney General says:

In this connection the Attorney General begs leave to advise and inform your honorable committee that these documents are of an official character, and that to submit them to the inspection of anyone not a member of the Department of Justice would be highly prejudicial to the best interests and subversive not only of the rights of the people of the United States but would be violative of the rights of those confidences, as many of these documents reflect, were given to the Government of the United States upon the express official understanding that such confidences would be treated and preserved as inviolate. (Hearing, p. 93.)

So the Attorney General refused to produce the documents, and the committee would not compel him to produce them, but contented itself by abusing KELLER and threatening to send him to jail because he would not, as the committee claimed, produce the evidence when the committee itself absolutely refused to produce the documents containing the evidence which KELLER specifically named and demanded. It seems to me the committee proceeded on the theory that the best thing to do was to heckle KELLER and the witnesses after the manner of some attorneys, when they have a bad case, to "cuss" the court and abuse the witnesses.

KELLER was not a witness. He never claimed to know any of the facts of his own personal knowledge. All he claimed to do was to be able to produce the evidence if given a fair opportunity, which I believe he could have done. He stated he was not a witness—

Mr. KELLER. I ask the right to address the committee, and I am going to ask you whether you are going to refuse to hear me on that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will be sworn—

Mr. KELLER. I do not have to be sworn.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will have you sworn; we will serve a subpoena on you; you can not bully this committee. (Hearings, p. 360.)

Notice the unfair, unjust, and insulting way Mr. KELLER was treated. He was not a witness, but desired to make a statement. Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. WOODRUFF both appeared before the committee, and each of them not only made a statement but testified and neither of them was sworn, nor did the committee require them to be sworn.

That committee, it seemed to me, half the time during the proceedings, did not know which way it was drifting so intent was it, I think honestly, on the exoneration of the Attorney General.

Without any intention whatever of comparing the committee to frogs, still its conduct sometimes reminded me of a doggerel about those creatures—

What a wonderful bird the frog are!
When he sit he stand almost,
When he hop he fly almost;
He ain't got no tail hardly, either;
When he sit, he sit on what he ain't got almost.

No real effort was made by the committee to obtain evidence as to why the Attorney General has not prosecuted the parties who have been violating the laws. It was the duty of the committee under the resolution.

The Attorney General, if my information is at all correct, has placed one Rocellar Gray, a negro, his chauffeur, on the Bureau of Investigation's pay roll, one of the highest paid men in that department. He draws pay from the Government, but is in reality Daugherty's chauffeur, according to my information. Mr. WOODRUFF submitted a list of witnesses in this matter and some papers as requested, but no effort was made to get at the facts.

Ambassador Harvey's son-in-law was indicted, according to information in New Jersey, for shipping arms or ammunition, or both, to Ireland in violation of law. The Department of Justice had the indictment sealed, and Attorney Crim was sent to New Jersey and had the case reopened before the grand jury and attempted to induce the grand jury not to return another indictment, and insisted on remaining in the grand jury room while the grand jury voted, but was not permitted to do so, and the grand jury returned another indictment in the case of Harvey's son-in-law, which the Department of Justice had dismissed under an old carpetbag statute which gives a district attorney the right to dismiss an indictment over the protest of the presiding judge.

The committee did not inquire into the charge that large quantities of whisky had been seized by agents of the Department of Justice and appropriated to the use of high officials in that department, and the Attorney General has failed and refused to prosecute any of them. The charge was made that a hundred thousand dollars' worth of confiscated liquors have been illegally disposed of by Government agents, and these agents, instead of being discharged, have been the recipients of favoritism and promotion; and William B. Matthews, formerly agent in charge of the Washington office of the bureau of investigations, stated:

The facts in the case are that every man connected with this affair has been treated as a favorite and has been placed in some other good job or given a promotion in the Government service.

A Washington grand jury investigated this case, but did not return an indictment because it was handicapped in obtaining evidence. This case was a matter of public notoriety and published in Washington newspapers.

The grand jury in its report stated that the investigation developed the fact that a large number of suit cases, trunks, and boxes, presumably containing alcoholic liquors, had been seized at the Union Station by agents of the Department of Justice and stored in rooms in that department and that during the periods of seizure, storage, and withdrawal no warrants were issued nor legal process instituted with regard to the persons transporting or parcels of liquor transported; that the liquor so seized while supposed to be forfeited to the United States was not in fact so forfeited for the reason that such seizure was never confirmed through legal action by the proper office of the Department of Justice, and therefore neither the liquors nor the persons transporting it ever came into the custody of the court. The grand jury further reported that certain representatives of the Department of Justice disposed of the liquor by making gifts to relatives and friends and by destroying such of it as appeared to be unfit for consumption. No prosecution was ever instituted by the Department of Justice, and no inquiry made by the Judiciary Committee. This violation was committed right under the nose of the Attorney General, yet he has made no move to get at the facts and no attempt to prosecute the guilty. It seems to me that the Department of Justice instead of being an instrument of prosecution has become a harbor for criminals.

The chairman of the committee, in his pursuit of KELLER in his remarks to-day, stated that—

Mr. KELLER himself selected this committee (Judiciary) as the one to make this investigation.

That was a loose statement and the chairman is evidently forgetful. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 11, 1922, shows that Mr. KELLER introduced his resolution together with some specifications, and that thereupon Mr. MONDELL moved that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee, which motion was adopted.

During the administration of President Taft, Morse, a New York banker, was charged with looting a bank and convicted and sent to the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary. In connection with Thomas B. Felder, a man of malodorous reputation, Mr. Daugherty undertook for a fee of $25,000 to secure from President Taft a pardon for Morse. Daugherty denied emphatically that he received any fee for getting Morse out of the penitentiary, and Senator Watson, of Indiana, denied it several times on the floor of the Senate, but after the letter from Felder to Leon O. Bailey was published stating that Morse had agreed to pay them $25,000 to secure the pardon and that if they would renew their efforts to secure the pardon he would pay them $100,000, Daugherty admitted it. It seems that Daugherty and Felder had failed in their first efforts. The latter cites several instances of Daugherty having visited Morse in New York to secure payment of this fee after Morse was pardoned. Six thousand dollars of it was paid. Felder further says in his letter that if it had not been for himself and Daugherty Morse would have been in his grave. A board of physicians was employed to examine Morse, but reported there was nothing seriously the matter with him. Another board examined Morse and reported him to be in a serious condition.

This was a board of Army doctors. They went to the office of Doctor Fowler, who had been the physician at the penitentiary when Morse was first incarcerated, and obtained a statement from him that Morse had incipient Bright's disease. With this as a cue, they came to Washington and obtained a promise from the President that if an examination showed that Morse's life would be endangered by confinement he would be released. Then they secured a board of Army doctors and had him examined, and they reported he had Bright's disease and was in a very precarious condition. Just after this occurred Felder made this significant statement:

We understood the department has since got hold of evidence that each time Morse was examined by this board of experts that he took either soapuds or some kind of chemicals that made his kidneys bleed, and therefore fooled the experts. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8018.)

Daugherty got the Morse case, not because he is a lawyer, but because he was close to the President, and practiced a fraud on the President to secure the pardon. Attorney General Daugherty denied he had anything to do with the Morse case, yet on April 30, 1913, he wrote a letter to Morse in which he said:

I inclose you herewith a copy of the letter setting forth the contract you made August 4, 1911, with Mr. Felder for his services and mine. You will observe that I was correct in the statement that there was a balance due when you were commuted. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7948.)

Fowler, the penitentiary surgeon engaged with Daugherty and Felder in perpetrating that fraud on President Taft, was discharged from his position, but was reinstated when Daugherty became Attorney General. There was nothing the matter with Morse. He immediately became well and hearty after his pardon and ready for new fields to pillage.

The Attorney General's action in the Bosch Magneto Co. is on a parity of rascality with the fraud practiced in the Morse case. That is one of the large cases pending before the Department of Justice, in which it is contended that the Government was robbed of anywhere from two to ten millions of dollars, and Mr. Scaife, a then special agent of the Department of Justice, made the investigation. He is the man whom the Attorney General wanted discharged, not because he did not tell the truth but because he gave out information to two Members of Congress. He discharged him saying, "You have been disloyal to the Department of Justice." Felder had been retained as counsel for the Bosch Magneto Co. Felder stated to Scaife that he had an interview with the Attorney General and the Attorney General had agreed to cooperate with him in the case and that the Attorney General wanted Felder to see Scaife and he desired to associate Scaife with him. Scaife refused to become associated with Felder. A letter to this effect was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD May 20, 1922. The Attorney General has never denied the truth of the statements contained in the letter, and, although Mr. Scaife was before the committee, the committee was very careful not to interrogate him about it.

Felder knew that Scaife was the gentleman who made the investigation in the case in which the Government was expected to recover millions of dollars, and came straight from the Attorney General's office, where he had a conference about this matter, and at the request of the Attorney General, and offered to employ Scaife to become the head of the defense in a suit which the Attorney General is presumed to bring against the Bosch Magneto Co. Thomas B. Felder, at the request of the Attorney General, attempted to lure away from the Government the investigator on whom the Government must rely to recover judgment against the Bosch Magneto Co. This one case is foul enough to impeach half a dozen Attorneys General.

Mr. Speaker, during the war a small group of men controlled the manufacture of airplanes, and among this number were the Standard Aircraft Corporation and the Standard Aero Co., which were controlled by Mitsui & Co., Japanese companies. In the fall of 1917 it was discovered that the Standard Aircraft Corporation had shipped five Liberty airplane motors from San Francisco to Japan, and the bill of lading for the shipment as set out in the Hughes investigation. In the answer of the Attorney General he alleges these claims have never been placed in his hands, but in the next paragraph contradicts himself by stating in effect that the Department of Justice had made laborious efforts in the matter, and asks to be excused from disclosing the facts on the alleged ground that it would be detrimental to the Government's interests to make these disclosures. It was brought out in the Graham investigation that the Mitsui company is the head of the Japanese secret service in this country.

In a settlement made between the Government and the Standard Aircraft Corporation the Government records show that over $2,000,000 was paid to these companies for amortization and depreciation of plants and machinery. The same settlement also shows an item of $375,000 has been paid them for rent. It is evident the company could not collect for a building it did not own and therefore one or the other of these items was a false claim. An investigation was made which disclosed that these companies had never owned the plant or building and therefore had defrauded the Government out of over $2,000,000. The files in the Air Service and in the Contract Audit Section of the War Department will substantiate these statements. I suggested that Secretary of War Weeks be called before the committee as I wanted this matter inquired into, but my suggestion was not heeded by the committee. This matter has long been known to the Attorney General and he has taken no steps whatever to prosecute this matter and the committee did not take the trouble to obtain any testimony in regard to it but contended itself with heckling. In this matter the Attorney General has dodged his official duty and is subject to impeachment.

Mr. Speaker, the Attorney General had favored the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. in that he had indictments dismissed against the directors of the United States Gas & Improvement Co. for violation of the antitrust laws. The directors of this company were indicted for numerous violations of the antitrust law charging them with killing off competing companies and the Attorney General had the indictments dismissed on the flimsy pretext that there might be a variance between the allegations of the indictments and the proof, and the committee accepted this lame excuse and did not go into the merits of the case, although R. Moman, on December 21, 1922, telegraphed the committee demanding to be heard.

The charge was made that the Attorney General favored the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and Samuel Untermyer informed the committee that he had valuable testimony to offer in connection with the General Electric Co. and cement cases. The General Electric Co. is a criminal monopoly and has placed upon the people of the United States a 100 per cent monopoly of the business of electric-light bulbs. The bulb business constituted only 20 per cent of the volume of the total business of that company, but it yielded 85 per cent of its total profits. This was long since placed in the hands of the Attorney General fully prepared, but he has made no effort whatever to prosecute this criminal combination.

There are a number of other cases in which the Attorney General signally failed to perform his official duty. They are too numerous to specify, and the committee, had it so minded, could have obtained testimony of his dereliction in these cases, but it dodged the matter by demanding that KELLER furnish the evidence, when the resolution authorizes and directs the committee and not KELLER to inquire into the official conduct of the Attorney General.

The forgetful chairman of the committee states in his remarks to-day that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], who asks for further investigation, made no such demand when the committee closed its hearings. The chairman stated when

Mr. Howland had made a statement, had testified relative to certain specifications, "if you are through we will go into executive session," which was done. Nothing was said about the hearings being closed. In executive session I refused to vote for the Volstead resolution exonerating Daugherty and stated I thought there should be further investigation and would offer a minority report, which I did. The chairman of the committee should read the record and polish up his memory before he makes loose statements.

Into the controversy came jumping the effervescent, bounding, bounding, bucking gentleman from the sun-baked plains of Texas [Mr. BLANTON], a man of many good parts, but, like the traditional parrot, he talks too much. He came with blood in his eye and talked of scaffolds and hangings, and seemed to have gone on the brain. He in no way discussed the evidence or merits of the case, but contented himself with wholesale abuse of all witnesses in the case who had the temerity to give any testimony at all reflecting on Daugherty, and he was especially severe on the attorneys he presumed represented Mr. KELLER, as well as Samuel Gompers. The mention of Gompers's name always puts him into an intense rage, and the thought of the American Federation of Labor or any other labor organization, except the farmers in his own particular district, throws him into a conniption fit, but he acts very kindly toward the farmers of his district because they do the principal part of the voting in that section; otherwise he probably would be as virulent toward them, because they are laboring people, but he is careful not to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. He states if there had been no strike there would have been no injunction and no impeachment. He knows full well that the railroads caused the strike. He knows they violated their written agreement to meet the railroad employees long before the strike and arbitrate the question of wages, and violated their written agreement and demanded a reduction of wages and an increase of rates, which they, through the assistance of Daugherty and the Interstate Commerce Commission, obtained. He knows that for months before that it was generally published that the railroads intended to break down the labor organizations, and in pursuance of that policy secured the passage through Congress of the infamous Esch-Cummins railroad bill, to enable the railroads to collect from the people sufficient funds to bear the expenses in attempting to disorganize the labor organizations. He knows that under the law millions of dollars were collected from the people, including the farmers of his district, whom he professes to so devotedly love, and turned over to the railroads for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the railroads in that effort. He knows he voted for that bill to take money out of the pockets of his farmer constituents to give to the railroads.

He manifested in his remarks no respect for old age and gray hairs, but was exceedingly abusive toward Samuel Gompers because he obeyed the subpoena of the committee and appeared and testified, and was equally abusive of KELLER for the reason that he refused to testify and wanted to hang somebody.

The truth is Mr. BLANTON did not discuss the relevant testimony adduced in the case. He seems to have an inordinate desire to see his name appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He appears to be a monomaniac on the subject of seeing his name in the RECORD. He seems to have arrived at that state of mind that he believes—

Every day and every minute,
The RECORD's wrong if I'm not in it.

The fact is, Mr. BLANTON manifested no conception of the merits of the case but contented himself to indulge in villification. He has about as much knowledge of the case as a swan floating on the broad bosom of mid-Atlantic has of the immeasurable depths beneath it.

Mr. Gompers was present in obedience to a subpoena. He conducted himself with modesty, decorum, dignity, and courtesy. His testimony was brief and simple, and only to the effect that after having been sent for by Daugherty in regard to the Burns appointment he protested against the appointment, which statement was admitted by Daugherty's attorney and proved by several other witnesses. That and the fact he is a member of the American Federation of Labor is the cause of the outpouring of BLANTON'S vials of wrath.

No member of the committee nor Member of the House who has discussed this question to-day has touched upon the evidence. All of them have studiously avoided that. KELLER has been abused and charged with discourtesy toward the committee, of which I do not think he is guilty, and I desire to call attention to some of the epithets that have been hurled at him and witnesses and attorneys engaged in this case. They are such as "cheap political scavengers," "muckraking klan," "dirty politics," "henchmen," "shyster lawyer," "dastardly act," "insolent attempt," "insolent letter," "insolent and abusive epistle," "falsehoods and misrepresentations," "insolent manner," "promptly have gone to jail," "friend and attorney of prominent anarchists," "innocent dupe," "messenger boy," "an anarchist," "to blackguard the Attorney General," "false and voluminous charges," "weasel politics," "dissembling Samuel," "insolent attitude," "slander and scandal," "scurrilous charges," "disseminators of falsehood and calumny," "mixed hatreds, emotions, and falsehoods," "arrogant, truculent, and offensive," "impertinent," "disgusting and demoralizing," "wholesale, reckless, rampant, and discriminating abuse," "slandorous attack," "willful and malicious misrepresentation."

These and some other affectionate epithets were hurled at KELLER, witnesses, and attorneys in this case in the committee and on the floor of the House to-day by the exceedingly courteous committee which complains of discourteous words used by Mr. KELLER.

Mr. Speaker, the committee in consideration of the Daugherty matter at times proceeded as though the resolution had been passed by the House and it had been authorized to conduct an investigation and even more; it proceeded as though the House itself had had prepared a bill of impeachment and the committee was the United States Senate sitting as a court to hear evidence on this bill. Such action was a usurpation of the prerogatives of the House and Senate and finally it was turned into a farcical proceeding.

The committee appeared to me to have prepared barrels of whitewash for Daugherty and barrels of blackwash for KELLER, because he had dared to exercise his constitutional privilege of calling attention to what he believed to be reprehensible and impeachable official conduct of the Attorney General and requested that Congress inquire as to the conduct of that official. The rulings made from time to time as to evidence by the committee have, in my opinion, no parallel in any court in the land.

Mr. KELLER divided his accusations into 14 divisions or charges, together with a number of subdivisions, making a total of about 130 alleged instances of official misconduct on the part of the Attorney General. KELLER was present and represented during the hearings on only 2 of these 130 charges, and because of the heckling he had been subjected to by the committee and the discourtesy with which he had been treated withdrew from further participation in the proceedings. In this course he was fully justified, as he had a constitutional duty to perform and it was his right and duty to refuse to participate in proceedings which, in his opinion, were violative of his fundamental obligations and rights as a Member of the House.

After KELLER'S withdrawal the greater part of the committee's time was consumed, in my opinion, in devising ways and means to shut out any testimony that might tend to substantiate the Keller charges. Unless I am greatly mistaken in my opinion several of the members of the committee acted as advocates for the Attorney General in combating the charges, and I think there is ample evidence of this in the published hearings. It seemed to me it was not necessary for the Attorney General to be represented by counsel and few were the questions asked by the Attorney General's counsel, as that was diligently looked after by several members of the committee. It would require much time to specify the many gross failures of the committee to make any effort to get at the real facts of the many charges. The very nature of an impeachment proceeding is to remove an unfit official from office. Were he guilty of crimes, he could be reached by courts.

Mr. Speaker, Anglo-Saxon law and tradition from the earliest time have universally and tenaciously held to the doctrine that nonfeasance or conduct prejudicial to the interest of the public are sufficient to remove public officials from office. I believe the discourtesy shown KELLER and contempt manifested toward him amounts to a notice that if any Member of the House dares to exercise his constitutional right to criticize a public official of the executive branch of the Government he will become the victim of espionage and persecution.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the fact that to argue against the passage of this resolution is like casting pearls before swine, but the people of this Republic will not forever submit to a condition in which the great Department of Justice shall remain in charge of persons utterly unfitted to hold this exalted position.

Some gentleman in his remarks to-day, if I caught his words aright, stated that all the newspapers are for Daugherty. That statement is ridiculous and even if true throws no light on the subject. One Washington newspaper in its report of the first day's proceedings was very severe on the conduct of the committee, but afterwards remained silent. No doubt that invisible Government to which Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota referred touched the mainspring of that paper's opinion and it remained silent thereafter.

Daugherty will not be exonerated by the House; he will be "whitewashed." Of the gentlemen here to-day who have evaded the evidence and spoken so vehemently in defense of the Attorney General nearly all of them are "lame ducks," and most of them, according to reports, are applicants for appointive positions. Mr. WOODRUFF, one of the men who asked for the investigation, received every vote cast in his district, and Mr. KELLER, making an issue of the Daugherty case, received the largest majority ever cast for him, while Mr. VOLSTEAD, coming from the same State as KELLER, was overwhelmingly defeated.

The farmers of the country, the men with the hoe, who furnish the staff of life without which the world would perish, the miners—the subterranean fighters, who furnish the fuel to light and warm the world—the soldiers of the rail, the veterans of the cab, who serve in the front danger line of the grand army of transportation, and every class of labor is just as much entitled to organize to protect their rights as any other class of citizens.

It has been held in the United States that impeachment will lie against public officers for gross abuse or betrayals of trust, for inexcusable neglect of duty, although no indictable crime either at common law or under any statute be committed. (Cooley Constitutional Law, 159.) It has been fully shown by the evidence, and could have been further shown had the committee produced the evidence which it could have done, that the Attorney General has been guilty of gross abuses, betrayals of trust, and willful neglect of duties in numerous instances.

The Attorney General was an apt pupil of the George B. Cox school of political activity in Cincinnati. Cox was known far and wide as a corrupt politician who bossed Cincinnati and controlled and corrupted the courts. So incensed did the people of that city become because of the corrupt activities of Cox that they arose in their indignation and wrath and burned the courthouse, and Daugherty does not seem to have reformed or abandoned the methods he acquired under the teachings of Cox.

The man who has a valid defense and is conscious of his innocence and is sufficiently intelligent to make a clear statement but shirks a cross-examination furnishes strong evidence of guilt. There is no statute or rule of evidence to prevent the public from presuming that when an intelligent man is arraigned charged with the commission of an offense his failure to testify is very strong evidence against him. Daugherty did not testify, as he probably feared cross-examination. When he must have realized his dangerous position he was content to remain absent and permit his henchmen to testify for him without venturing to support them. Newberry did not succeed in his course of conduct in not testifying, nor will the Attorney General succeed in securing the verdict of the public by his failure to appear and testify.

The Attorney General's defense has been flimsy and contradictory excuses. Pages of human history are filled with unpalatable excuses because of duties unperformed and crimes committed. In the beginning, when Cain slew Abel and was charged with the offense, he defended himself by inquiring, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Such has been the subterfuge of mankind all through the flight of time. Before the tables of stone were delivered to Moses, amid the thunders and lightnings of Sinai, before the building of the pyramids, those silent sentinels of the desert that have withstood the ravages of time, before the construction of the Egyptian Sphinx, which has stood unmoved for centuries in the trackless wastes of Libyan sands, and before the barons wrested the charter of English liberty from King John at Runnymede, mankind has always been ready with excuses for crimes committed and duty neglected. It was so when the scarred and veteran legions of Caesar bore aloft the imperial Roman eagles. It was true when Mark Anthony loved, when Christ was crucified, and when Homer sang, and will be until the end of time, and—

No thief e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.

The oppressive and felonious claws of bureaucracy are clutching at the prerogatives of Congress, and already I can hear the death rattle in its throat in the surrender of the rights of the people and the privileges of the legislative branch of the Government to the demands of the executive departments. If reformation does not come, and public officials are not taught that public office is a public trust, if public officials are not properly disciplined for dishonesty and official misconduct, then, eventually, the black tempest of revolution in mournful cadence will sweep over this Republic—

Like dreams of sorrow o'er the face
Of sleeping beauty,

"and the grass, green from the soil of carnage," will wave above the graves of millions slain.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS].

Mr. JEFFERIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, when considering the charges and the making thereof against the Attorney General certain events and the time of their occurrence are most instructive.

On July 1, 1922, some 260,000 of the 400,000 railway shopmen went out on strike.

On September 1 the Attorney General filed a bill in equity in the Federal court of Chicago, and a restraining order was issued restraining the striking shopmen and their leaders from interfering with the operations of interstate commerce.

On September 9 to 16 Samuel Gompers and the executive council of the American Federation of Labor were in session.

On September 11 the Attorney General, having given 10 days' legal notice to the defendants in the Chicago case, commenced the introduction of evidence contained in some 1,700 affidavits to obtain, if possible, a temporary injunction.

On the same day, September 11, Representative KELLER, of Minnesota, in the House of Representatives, made impeachment charges against the Attorney General, alleging, among other things, that he had abridged the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the right of the people to peaceably assemble, and at the same time introduced Resolution 425, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the official conduct of the Attorney General and to report whether or not he had been guilty of any acts which could be considered as high crimes and misdemeanors in office and which would warrant his impeachment.

On September 16 the Judiciary Committee met to proceed with the hearings, but Representative KELLER was not prepared to offer any evidence in support of his contentions.

On November 23 the committee requested the Representative for a more specific statement of the act or acts about which he complained.

On December 1 Representative KELLER filed his amplified specifications.

On the 1st and 2d days of December the Progressives met in Washington, and Mr. Samuel Untermyer, of New York City, on the evening of December 2, at the dinner of the Progressives, attacked the Attorney General and disgorged himself of an effervescent diatribe of marked similarity to the amplified specifications filed on the 1st day of December by Representative KELLER.

On December 4 the Attorney General filed with the committee a specific answer to each and all of the so-called charges, and the committee promptly announced its readiness to proceed with the hearing of evidence, but Mr. KELLER stated he was not ready to proceed, and that he could not do so unless the committee obtained the power to subpoena witnesses, so the chairman of the committee on that same day, in order to make some progress, secured the adoption of Resolution 461 by the House of Representatives, which authorized the Committee on the Judiciary to send for persons and papers and to sit during sessions of the House.

On December 12 Representative KELLER and Mr. Ralston, attorney for the Representative and the American Federation of Labor, appeared before the committee, as did certain other persons who had been requested to appear as witnesses.

At the opening of the hearing Mr. Howland, a former Member of Congress from the State of Ohio, who was present representing Attorney General Daugherty, addressed the committee, saying:

I now respectfully ask the committee to ask who these gentlemen are associated with Mr. KELLER in this impeachment proceeding?

This modest request to learn the mere names of the persons associated with Representative KELLER in the charges caused considerable of an explosion, as the following inquiries establish:

Mr. RALSTON. Mr. Chairman, for the issues that are before this committee, the gentleman will pardon me for saying that the question is entirely impertinent. The only issue before this committee is the one of the innocence of his client.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you refuse to answer the question?

Mr. RALSTON. It is not a question before this committee.

Mr. HOWLAND. It is now; I have put it before the committee.

Mr. RALSTON. It is not before the committee unless it is pertinent.

Mr. HOWLAND. Very good.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Can you not state briefly the parties interested in this?

Mr. RALSTON. I can state briefly, yes, the parties interested in it. I can not, naturally, enumerate them. They are something over 100,000,000 in number.

Mr. FOSTER. Did they help prepare this? This says, "those were prepared by men who are interested in this impeachment proceeding with me."

Mr. RALSTON. His clerk's assistance, I suppose, he has a right to get with or without compensation.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not refer to that; I refer to the statement made by Mr. KELLER. It is up to you whether you care to give that information. It says, "those were prepared by men who are interested in this impeachment proceeding with me," and his question was whether you cared to state who they were.

Mr. RALSTON. If the committee votes that is a pertinent inquiry, that it has anything to do with the issues before this committee, I will answer it as far as is within my power.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Do you not think, in order to see whether this is a prosecution in good faith or not, that the committee and the country would like to know whether it has animus behind it; and you can tell that, possibly, by knowing who the individuals are who helped to prepare this.

Mr. RALSTON. The question of whether this is in good faith or bad faith depends upon the facts which will be developed here. If Mr. Daugherty intends to rest his defense upon the good faith or bad faith of his accusers, he is at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. JEFFERIS. It is not what Mr. Daugherty intends; it has got beyond Mr. Daugherty. This is a matter of national importance, and the people are interested, as I view it, in knowing whether or not they will continue to have confidence in their Government.

Mr. RALSTON. The people are interested in knowing whether or not the facts we put forth are true.

Mr. KELLER filed these charges last September, I believe. Now, Mr. KELLER has gotten assistance from many sources since then and expects to get assistance from many sources in the future which will tend to support these charges. Now, Mr. KELLER on his oath as a Member of Congress, filed the charges.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Suppose we grant that. What is there, what reason is there, that you could not or would not be willing to state the men who have helped to prepare these charges?

Mr. RALSTON. I have no personal objection to it at all, except its utter impertinence and, if I could copy an expression used by Mr. Daugherty, an attempt on his part to create a smoke screen before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, I do not think so.

Mr. RALSTON. I think so, absolutely.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that seeking to create a smoke screen, when he is not seeking to suppress the names of his prosecutors?

Mr. RALSTON. I am not seeking to suppress any names. If the committee rules that is pertinent to the question, I will answer.

Mr. CHANDLER. It certainly is.

Mr. RALSTON. It seems to me it is entirely impertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think that it is an impertinent question. It is one which is asked in courts in the trial of cases.

Mr. RALSTON. I have never known of its being asked in the trial of a criminal case before in my experience.

The CHAIRMAN. It is involved in nearly every case.

Mr. RALSTON. It is always involved, yes, if there is no other defense, which appears to be the case here, so far.

The CHAIRMAN. Go on and answer the question.

Mr. RALSTON. If the chairman rules it is pertinent—

The CHAIRMAN. I rule it is pertinent.

Mr. RALSTON. I consider it is a smoke screen. However, Mr. KELLER has had my assistance; he has had the assistance of his secretary, I have no doubt. Whether he has had other assistance in the presentation of this thing—there are two secretaries—but whether he has had other assistance in the preparation of this thing, I do not know.

Mr. HICKEY. Have you any objection to stating who compensates you for your services?

Mr. RALSTON. I was asked to prepare those without any question of compensation.

Mr. HICKEY. By whom?

Mr. RALSTON. I was asked, so far as the particular issues he is acquainted with are concerned, by Mr. Gompers, and no question was raised as to compensation.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Gompers is president of the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. RALSTON. Yes, he is; he is also an American citizen.

Mr. HICKEY. And you are attorney for the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. RALSTON. Yes; I have been on many occasions.

Mr. HICKEY. So that you really appear for this organization at this time?

In the course of time Mr. Ralston, the attorney for Representative KELLER and the American Federation of Labor, evidently concluded that he would make an effort to deal frankly with the committee, and announced:

Mr. RALSTON. I want to deal frankly with the committee. So far as those first charges are concerned, I do not expect to deal with them personally at all. I have not studied them; I did not prepare them; and Mr. Undermyer is particularly interested in them, and I presume expects or hopes to appear before this committee. You will understand from that that up to this time the charges which I have particularly prepared myself, or aimed to prepare myself, are three in number.

Mr. HICKEY. I understand, but I thought likely you had some information from those who did prepare them.

Mr. RALSTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask Mr. KELLER.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at the time we had the first hearing, when I appeared before the committee, you set the following Tuesday for me to appear before this committee with the attorney. I saw Mr. Undermyer the following Sunday, and he is the man who is interested in those first charges.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you know about them yourself?

Mr. KELLER. I am not ready to state right now.

Mr. GRAHAM. You preferred these charges. Now can not you produce the evidence that moved you to make these solemn and serious charges against a public official on the floor of Congress?

Mr. KELLER. I will be ready when I get ready.

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, no; you won't. Do not get impudent with the committee.

Mr. KELLER. I say I am not prepared this morning to take them up. I am simply answering a question of Mr. FOSTER, and that is on the following Monday I said when I appeared before this committee Mr.

Undermyer would have been ready on Tuesday to come here and answer these charges. This committee adjourned until December 4. Now Mr. Undermyer is in such shape that he can not appear at any particular time and take care of these particular charges.

Mr. GRAHAM. May I ask a question at this point? Mr. KELLER, you say you consulted Mr. Undermyer when?

Mr. KELLER. The first time was on a Sunday following the meeting on September 16.

Members of the committee thus learned after much effort that the three chief promoters and actors in the scheme designed to bring about the impeachment of Attorney General Daugherty were the two versatile Samuels and one Representative.

Since these three participated in originating the false and voluminous charges against a single officer, some might think of them as three of a kind, but the fact is that each of them plies his individual art in his own special manner when playing what Will Payne would call "weasel politics" in a vain effort to destroy the good name of the present administration and to disrupt the Republican Party.

Some were led to believe from the vaporings of Samuel Undermyer, of New York City, as published in the press, that he was just "rearing to come" as a volunteer, without hope of pecuniary reward or compensation, to prosecute the alleged impeachment charges in a notorious attempt, as many believe, to intimidate the Attorney General in the discharge of his official duties.

But this dissembling Samuel, having received much publicity and notoriety in the free advertising columns of the press, was pleased to remain in New York and play "weasel politics" in Big Bertha fashion by belching forth poisonous slander against the Attorney General and members of the Judiciary Committee.

While this wily Samuel remained in New York City the committee thoroughly and fairly investigated the specifications which he had fomented against the Attorney General. The committee heard the open, straightforward, sworn testimony of Col. William Hayward, an eminent lawyer of national reputation and standing, who is serving the Government of the United States as district attorney for the southern district of New York with that same degree of fidelity and zeal which distinguished him as a brave and courageous soldier, one of the Nation's defenders and heroes upon the battle field, and found that Samuel's charges were the mere vaporous productions of his wild and distorted imagination.

The distant, isolated, and insolent attitude of this Samuel deprived the committee of an opportunity to see this self-important mortal in his habiliments of clay and prevented the committee from learning how it was possible for him in New York to know or, rather, pretend to know so much which never occurred before the committee in Washington.

However, this crafty Samuel, the Big Bertha of long-distance slander and scandal, by avoiding the Judiciary Committee furnished the country with conclusive proof that the freedom of speech and freedom of the press to defame and attempt to assassinate the reputations of Cabinet officials and Members of Congress have survived the recent Chicago injunction.

The New York Samuel knew this full well, but for fear that some of his kind might not, he belched forth the scurrilous charges against the Attorney General and members of the committee to notify his fellow disseminators of falsehood and calumny that it was still open season for feeding the flames of unrest and discontent among the people by slandering honorable men who are responsible for the administration of the orderly functions of government.

This Samuel's absence on the 12th and 13th days of December troubled the other Samuel and the Representative from Minnesota more than their gloomy faces indicated. They were mentally depressed when Senator HIRAM JOHNSON testified to the high character and courage of William J. Burns and told how he, the Senator, had recommended Burns to the Attorney General for appointment, but their hopes fell to 40 degrees below zero when Mr. Stevenson, the able lawyer for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, testified that the Attorney General was ready, willing, and anxious at all times to help the brotherhoods as the facts would warrant in every way within his power to obtain the relief they sought, and that, in the judgment of the witness, the Attorney General should not be impeached.

The next morning, December 14, the Representative came before the committee all alone; neither of the Samuels was present to stimulate his waning courage. Disappointment settled heavily upon the brow of the lone survivor, so he hunted his trusty telephone, called the Samuel of New York, 226 miles away, and told him of his plight and want of evidence. Now, the Samuel of New York may have told the Representative to write a letter denouncing the committee and to refuse to have anything more to do with the charges, and to tell the committee he had made this decision after consultation with his advisers, among them being Mr. Samuel Untermyer, of New York City.

Anyway, the Representative wrote the letter denouncing the committee, refused to proceed further with the charges, and told the committee that he made this decision after consultation with his advisers, among them being Samuel Untermyer, of New York, and then the Representative made his get-away to his sanctuary of silence, from whence even a subpoena issued by the House of Representatives and signed by the honored Speaker failed to budge him.

The committee heard nothing further from Samuel of the house of Untermyer from the 14th of December until the evidence had been completed upon all the charges and the same had been printed. Then, on the 4th of January of the new year, Samuel, of New York, oiled up his typewriter, conned his unabridged dictionary, and wrote a scorching five-page letter denouncing the committee and hurled it at the chairman of the committee through the United States mail. By this act of long-distance throwing, after he had advised the Representative to proceed no further, some think that the New York Samuel hopes to be known as one of the world's famous athletes.

In this last effort of Samuel's to become famous by denouncing and belittling others one might think that he feeds upon the meat of ferocious animals and now when the hearings are closed that he was anxious to tear the very vitals of the Attorney General had the committee subpoenaed him to come after he had advised the Representative from Minnesota to quit, but whom he, in his letter of January 4, says he never represented, and with whom he never at any time sustained professional relations, meaning that he had received no money as a retainer for his stunts of long-distance throwing of advice and counsel.

Samuel's doings two weeks after the hearings were closed reminds me very much of that old coon dog down in Texas which would not fight a live coon, but when one had been shot and killed and everything was all over the old dog would rush up and shake the dead coon and growl and roar like a ferocious lion.

If the Samuels of the Untermyer type, by nation-wide publicity and propaganda of mixed hatreds, emotions, and falsehoods, could succeed in undermining and destroying the confidence of the people in the integrity of Government officials and Representatives in Congress, they would tear away the very foundations upon which this Government rests, and the institutions of liberty, which have flourished for nearly a century and a half under the Constitution of the Republic, would fall as the star from heaven, fading as it drops.

The other Samuel—Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor—with his private secretary and attorney, did come before the committee and made solemn affirmation to tell the truth as a witness.

He was asked when it was that he suggested to Mr. Ralston, the attorney for the federation, that impeachment proceedings should be started against the Attorney General. Samuel answered that he did not know that impeachment proceedings were to be brought against Mr. Daugherty until after he read them in the newspapers.

Later on I asked him:

I was trying to fix the date when the action was taken here by the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor to go ahead or take part in these charges against the Attorney General.

To this inquiry Samuel answered:

The dates, as near as I can recollect, I think it was on the 14th of November when the executive council, or the 16th, when the executive council met in its regular session.

The answers of Samuel, the witness, would tend to prove that neither he nor the executive council were interested in the charges made by Representative KELLER in the House on September 11, 1922, until about the middle of the following November.

But the American Federationist, the official magazine of the American Federation of Labor, of which Samuel Gompers is the editor, in its October issue, at pages 768 to 769, tells a different story and flatly contradicts and impeaches the statement of Samuel, the witness, and proves what the executive council was doing from September 9 to September 16.

The magazine says:

It was with these things in view that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor at its meeting, September 9 to September 16, determined to use all of its influence and to attempt to mobilize the strength of the organized-labor movement in an effort to bring about the impeachment of the Attorney General, who has so ruthlessly overriden the law and the Constitution of our Republic.

As a result of its decision, the following official communication was issued from the headquarters of the American Federation of Labor on September 18 (the first and last paragraphs are):

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 18, 1922.

To All Organized Labor.

GREETINGS: The injunction issued against the shopmen by Judge Wilkerson on application of Attorney General Daugherty is a most flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the laws enacted by our Congress. No one apparently is free from its sweeping provisions. It prohibits the freedom of speech, the freedom of press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble to discuss their grievances.

It is urged that you make immediate preparation for the holding of the mass meeting on Sunday, October 1, 1922; that you solicit and obtain the cooperation of the farmers, both as organizations and as individuals, and sympathetic, freedom-loving citizens of your community; also that resolutions be prepared and adopted by the mass meeting, copy of which, duly signed, should be transmitted to the Member of the House of Representatives representing your district at Washington, D. C., and forward a copy of the same to this office.

Fraternalty yours,

[SEAL.]
Attest:

JAMES DUNCAN, First Vice President.
JOSEPH F. VALENTINE, Second Vice President.
FRANK DUFFY, Third Vice President.
WILLIAM GREEN, Fourth Vice President.

Executive Council, American Federation of Labor.

The answers of Samuel, the witness, when compared with the article by Samuel, the editor, raise some vital queries, namely:

Did Samuel, the witness, though affirming to tell the truth, forget that the executive council had resolved during the week of September 9 to 16, as stated in the magazine, to use all of its influence not to impeach the Attorney General but to bring about his impeachment? Or did the failure of the crafty Samuel, of New York, to appear lead the Washington Samuel to conclude that it would look better for Representative KELLER to enjoy the distinction of sole authorship of the charges from September 11 until November 14, and that he, Samuel, and the executive council had only stepped forward at that time as incidental nurses to keep them clean and holy until Samuel, of New York, could come, and then they, the two mighty Samuels, would snatch the charges from the trembling arms of the Representative, who had nursed and clothed them with his love and high personal prerogatives during their early infancy?

Why did not Samuel and the executive council accompany Bert M. Jewell, president, and John Scott, secretary, of the railway employees department of the American Federation of Labor, and their attorneys, to court on September 11 and offer to introduce at least one affidavit or one witness to dispute some one of the 1,700 affidavits which the Attorney General and his assistants read in open court to support the bill in equity?

Why beat about the bush and urge organized labor to solicit "farmers" and "freedom-loving citizens" to join in holding mass meetings to pass resolutions to be forwarded to Members of the House in an effort "to bring about" the impeachment of the Attorney General when he was but striving in a peaceful, lawful way to keep railroad trains in operation in interstate commerce for the transportation of mails, and food from the fields, and fuel from the mines to enable all the great mass of freedom-loving people of the Republic to withstand the cold blasts of the coming winter?

Why have organized labor solicit farmers and sympathetic freedom-loving citizens to cooperate with them? Why insinuate that the farmers of the Nation are not a freedom-loving people? Where, I ask, are the people or a class of people who excel the American farmers as a freedom-loving people so long as they are not overreached by falsifiers and deceivers?

The propaganda of this Samuel and his executive council to bring about the impeachment of the Attorney General might fool some, but sympathetic, freedom-loving people go to the courts of the land when they have controversies to settle.

I have represented labor organizations in open court in strike-injunction controversies, and the truth proved their cause, and the court decided promptly in their favor. He who is armed with the truth does not have to run away or keep away from the courts or from the Judiciary Committee of the House.

But, perhaps, Samuel and the executive council were tainted with the belief, so tersely expressed on September 16 by Representative KELLER to the committee when he declared:

The committee should take the charges that I make, that they are true until they are proven not true.

If such was their belief then liberty-loving citizens had better look to the regular officers of the law throughout the Republic for protection, rather than to great actors playing "weasel politics." If the day ever comes when the mere making of charges proves their truth, then liberty-loving citizens may well tremble; for even injunctions may then be granted without the introduction of proof in open court to substantiate the charges of a bill in equity.

When this Samuel was upon the witness stand under solemn affirmation on the 13th day of December his testimony was confined to charge numbered 13, to the effect that the Attorney General should be impeached for having appointed William J. Burns Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, after Samuel in company with his private secretary on July 27, 1921, had brought to the attention of the Attorney General that Burns, according to the opinions expressed in two letters written in 1912 by former Attorney General Wickersham and President Taft, had been guilty of wrongdoing in reference to the names of a jury panel in 1905 when he—Burns—was in the employ of the Government assisting Francis J. Heney in the prosecution of a land-fraud case in Oregon, and that one Macauley had also sent the Attorney General a letter and some newspaper clippings tending to show that Burns was not a fit man for the position. Mr. Gompers admitted, however, that Burns had never been indicted or prosecuted for any wrongdoing in 1905 or at any other time.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON, Senator of the United States, then testified that he had recommended Mr. Burns's appointment:

Mr. HOWLAND. As near as you can remember, will you state to the committee, in substance, your recommendation to the Attorney General? Senator JOHNSON. I told him the experience I had had with Burns in San Francisco in the graft prosecutions; that I considered him one of the ablest detectives I had ever known; that I believed him to be a man of character and integrity; and that he would in every way possess the requisite qualifications for the office to which he aspired.

William J. Burns testified under oath of his long years of service in the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department and in the Department of the Interior; that he had long sought an opportunity to explain the opinions of him, expressed in the letters of 1912, and proceeded to do so in clear-cut, straightforward English.

Burns, as a witness, also informed the committee that the Burns Detective Agency, while looking after the business of the American Bankers' Association, had arrested Macauley, of Toronto, Canada, some years ago for passing counterfeit drafts of the Canadian Express Co., and that Macauley had not been friendly to him since that time.

Burns also testified that Mr. Gompers had been unfriendly toward him and had hounded him at every opportunity since he arrested the McNamaras at Indianapolis. This Mr. Gompers denied.

The appointment of Mr. Burns by the Attorney General was evidently disappointing if not actually displeasing to Mr. Gompers, who felt that his objections were controlling and that the Attorney General should have complied with his wishes in the matter.

Mr. Daugherty answered Macauley's letter in the following language:

I have been interested in reading your inclosures, which information I had before considering Mr. Burns's appointment. I have known Mr. Burns for many, many years and am quite sure he will render me and the administration faithful and efficient service.

Thus it was that charge 13, on the 13th of December, proved to be a defeat for Mr. Samuel Gompers, even though he had not stayed away or run away, and for Mr. William J. Burns it was a victory, a vindication of his integrity and sterling manhood.

When Samuel Untermyer, in his speech at the progressive meeting in Washington on December 2, charged the Attorney General with nonenforcement of the antitrust laws, and that such laws were a dead letter in the Department of Justice, he knew or ought to have known that Mr. Daugherty, within the 20 months that he had been Attorney General, had commenced proportionately as many actions in antitrust cases, if not more, than during the administration of any other Attorney General since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The exact figures are:

	Cases.
President Harrison, 4 years	7
President Cleveland, 4 years	8
President McKinley, 4 years	3
President Roosevelt, 8 years	44
President Taft, 4 years	80
President Wilson, 8 years	88
President Harding, 20 months	32

Untermyer likewise knew that during Mr. Daugherty's administration as Attorney General, for the first time in the 32 years' history of the Sherman Antitrust Act, defendants had been given jail sentences for the violation of that law. He knew also that the entire list of 35 or 36 cases which was turned over to the United States district attorney at New York by the Lockwood committee had been unsupported by any evidence of an interstate nature, and that many of the cases on the list were purely local in character and without interstate activities, which precluded their prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that the United States district attorney for New York was busy with an increased force investigating all of said alleged cases with the greatest of diligence.

That this New York Samuel under such conditions should write letters and attempt to impeach the integrity and good standing of the 21 members of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Attorney General of the United States before the court of public opinion without proof is but an illustration of his efforts to strain the credulity of the country into the belief that he is the only honest man in the whole lot.

Lawyers who have had experience in even one action of any magnitude where the witnesses lived far apart and the legal questions involved were complex know full well that it takes much time and work to prepare such a case before it can be filed in court, and every lawyer knows that the preparation before the commencement of suit is of greater importance than is the trial itself.

A résumé of the year's work accomplished by the Department of Justice during the administration of Harry M. Daugherty, in the Federal courts, should be a source of sincere pride to those who believe in law enforcement throughout the land.

In brief it is:

Civil suits have been initiated against builders of Army camps to recover for the Government sums in excess of $50,000,000.

A large number of individuals and corporations have been indicted, charged with criminal conspiracy against the Government resulting in the loss of millions of dollars in handling war contracts.

Prosecution of violators of food, drug, and prohibition acts have been vigorous. During the year fines approximating $5,000,000 were assessed in 25,000 of these cases.

More than 60,000 new criminal cases were docketed during the year and approximately 55,000 were terminated. There are now pending about 65,000 such cases.

Civil suits to which the United States is a party were instituted to the number of 9,646, and more than 8,000 were terminated. There are now pending approximately 12,000 civil suits affecting the United States.

More than 400 separate cases of importance, representing billions of dollars, are now in process of what may be called liquidation. The task is a stupendous one and beset with intricate obstacles.

Prosecution of antitrust law violations has been vigorous. Jail sentences or fines, and in some instances both, were imposed upon 63 corporations and individuals as a result of suits successfully prosecuted by the Department of Justice this year. The jail sentences were the first ever secured by the Government in antitrust cases. There are 36 cases of this character now pending, more than half of which were begun prior to July 1, 1921.

A drive has been inaugurated against those guilty of using the mails for fraudulent purposes, which has robbed the American people of not less than $150,000,000. Approximately 500 of these cases are in the hands of the United States district attorneys throughout the country, and the Department of Justice will push them to speedy trial.

The department has successfully defended the Government in litigation, as evidenced by the fact that in 262 suits against the Government, in which the claimants asked a total of approximately $38,000,000, the cases were disposed of and the claimants obtained an aggregate sum of a little less than $2,000,000. In civil suits the department has collected nearly $4,500,000 for the Government, and in criminal cases of all kinds it has collected in fines and penalties a total reaching nearly $8,000,000.

As fair-minded people learn the true record of the present Attorney General they, like the editorial in the New York American, will ask:

WHAT BIG INTERESTS HAVE SET OUT TO GET ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY?

What is all this attack on Attorney General Daugherty about?

Anybody who has had experience with persecutions of this kind knows they are not due to failure to be aggressive in performance of duty, but are always due to powerful enemies that have been offended by a just and impartial performance of duty.

The plain question in Attorney General Daugherty's case is, therefore, not what has Attorney General Daugherty failed to do, but in what vigorous way has he enforced the law, which has caused some big interest to hate him and to go out to "get him," and to stir up its big hired lawyers and its little owned politicians to attack the man who has offended this interest and to say things that will be printed in newspapers even though they are never proved nor even attempted to be proved?

The investigation of Attorney General Daugherty has fallen utterly flat.

No proof of any allegation has been presented. The chief accuser, and on the flimsiest of pretenses, has even refused to testify; and the evidence which has been heard from the most honorable and independent men like Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, has all been in defense of Attorney General Daugherty, and in support of Attorney General Daugherty, and in commendation of his acts and his activities.

What is needed now is another investigation, to find out who the big interests are who are attacking the Attorney General of the United States, and who are trying to discredit him and weaken him and weaken the force of his official procedure.

Is it the whisky ring, against which the Attorney General's office has been especially active?

Is it the war profiteers, who were so powerful with the late Democratic administration?

Is it the Palmer-Garvan outfit, who fraudulently confiscated alien property and delivered it to their friends, and whom the Attorney General has exposed?

Most surely there is some big interest and some corrupt interest responsible for the attacks upon the Attorney General of the United States, which attacks up to this time have been so utterly baseless and futile as to make them an insult to the American people whom the Attorney General represents.

Surely the enemies of Harry Daugherty have made a sorry showing. They sought to destroy his good name, because he had the courage to prosecute an injunction suit to preserve the common welfare of the whole people of the Nation—even though it displeased an organized minority—because he had the courage to prosecute and put in jail violators of the antitrust laws, because he had the courage to indict and bring suits against profiteers in war-fraud cases, as well as against other violators of the law.

To-day 110,000,000 of freedom-loving people, inhabiting 3,000,000 square miles of territory beneath the Stars and Stripes, know that 260,000 miles of railroads built from the savings of the American people, at a cost of many millions of dollars, and employing 1,600,000 workmen, are in operation throughout the land in interstate commerce; that business and industry are forging forward; that Harry M. Daugherty and Judge Wilkerson, by following a precedent established in 1894, made this possible, brought order out of chaos without the help of a single soldier. With the passing of time, even leaders of organized labor are beginning to sing songs of cheer to the rank and file, who pay their salaries. Prosperity and progress are at hand because of the wise policies of the administration of President Harding.

E. H. Fitzgerald, grand president of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, in an article entitled "New faith and new hope," in the January issue of the American Federationist, says:

Traffic has been increased month after month at an amazing rate until to-day the number of carloadings almost equal those of 1920—the greatest traffic year in American railroad history.

Everything points to the fact that the improvement is not merely temporary or seasonal but healthy and lasting. The railroads are a barometer to other industries, and heavy traffic demands mean increased employment in all lines of business.

Aye, leaders of organized labor are apparently beginning to recognize and appreciate the great benefits that labor received by the action of the Government in keeping the railroads in operation, even if they do not say so.

Bearing in mind what Mr. Fitzgerald states with reference to the railroads being the barometers of business activities, it is most hopeful and reassuring to read in the American Federationist the article by Daniel J. Tobin, treasurer of the American Federation of Labor and general president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen, and Helpers of America, in part as follows:

During the past year the great struggle of the workers was of such a nature that at times it looked as though the life of the labor movement and its usefulness to the workers was in serious danger. On New Year's Day, 1922, there were nearly 5,000,000 men and women out of employment, while on this New Year's Day, 1923, there are perhaps only a few thousand that can not find employment. With 5,000,000 men and women out of work, it was pretty hard to hold the great labor movement of our country together, because, with hungry hordes everywhere, rules and principles are easily set aside and this condition confronted us at the beginning of the year just past.

W. D. Mahon, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, president Amalgamated Association Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, in his article entitled, "Electric railway men look upon New Year with confiding promise," in the same issue of the Federationist, also voices the spirit of prosperity, content, and optimism of his associates when speaking of the increased employment of labor and its resultant benefits. He says:

The street and electric railway business is so interwoven in social life as to be largely dependable upon the movements of other industries, and the general resumption of shop employment is bringing great relief to street-railway properties, which is as well an advantage to the workers, and there are many more men employed in this vocation at the beginning of the year 1923 than were so employed at the beginning of the year 1922.

The American people are appreciating the splendid services of Attorney General Daugherty more and more. When truth gets a hearing, falsehood seeks the cover of silence. Whether Representative KELLER be punished by the House of Representatives, as I believe he should be, or by his conscience in the sanctum of his "little gray home in the West," he will long remember the day when he thought it better to flee from the Committee on the Judiciary than to remain and reveal the fact that he was without evidence to support his charges.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is an adverse report. May I inquire how it happens to the upon the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Speaker has given that matter attention, and if the gentleman from Tennessee will withhold his parliamentary inquiry I believe the Speaker will answer it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BIRD].

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Speaker, on the 11th day of September, 1922, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. KELLER, a Representative in Congress from the fourth district of Minnesota, arose in his seat and upon his responsibility as a Member exercised his high privilege and set in motion impeachment proceedings against the Hon. Harry M. Daugherty, the Attorney General of the United States, upon the charge that the said Harry M. Daugherty had been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. Upon the same day the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] offered House Resolution 425 to the effect that the Committee on the Judiciary of the House be authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Mr. Daugherty and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, he had been guilty of any acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. By this proceeding the Committee on the Judiciary, a standing committee of the House, became charged with the responsibility of inquiring into the official acts of the Attorney General with a view to determining whether or not high crimes and misdemeanors had been committed in office such as would require the House to make appearance before the bar of the Senate and there make charges of impeachment.

Three conclusions were to be reached: First, what are high crimes and misdemeanors in office as to require impeachment; second, what specific acts of dereliction were in the mind of the accuser; and, third, to consider the nature, reliability, and the sufficiency of the evidence to be submitted and obtainable.

There can be no doubt but that as our Government has advanced the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" has been greatly broadened until it embraces malfeasance, misfeasance, or dereliction, or any acts that cause the office held to be in disgrace and disrepute, and in the consideration of the matter before it the committee held to this broad interpretation.

House Resolution No. 425 was promptly called up in the committee on the 16th day of September, 1922, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] was asked if he desired to be heard upon the resolution. The gentleman stated at that time that he was not a lawyer; that he desired to be permitted to have counsel to aid him; that he be given a reasonable time to prepare his case; and, further, at that time took the astounding position, so unknown to American jurisprudence and common fairness, that "I have made my charges, and they are true until they are proven not true." Continuance was had, counsel unlimited was permitted, and the gentleman was at that time requested to amplify his accusations by filing written charges and specifications with the committee. This was done, and after several preliminary meetings of the committee the hearing upon the resolution, 425, was begun. The charges under the written specifications fall into several divisions; failure properly to conduct the office of the Attorney General with reference to antitrust proceedings, failure to enforce the safety laws of the United States with reference to railroad equipment during the railroad strike of last year, improper use of injunctive relief in the Chicago case, improper dismissal of one Major Watts, improper conduct with reference to criminal law violators and those convicted of crime, the improper appointment of William J. Burns as the Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice. All charges were contradicted and denied in entirety by the Attorney General.

Mr. KELLER appeared by his counsel, Mr. Jackson H. Ralston, attorney for the American Federation of Labor, and statement was made that the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Samuel Gompers, its president, Mr. Samuel Untermyer, and others had assisted and aided in the bringing of the charges. Considerable effort was made to ascertain what Mr. KELLER knew personally upon the subject, but those efforts were unavailing, he refusing steadfastly and determinedly to divulge any information upon the charges, which refusal continued throughout the hearings even to the extent of refusal to obey the subpoena of the House.

The hearing proceeded upon specification 13, which refers to the appointment of Mr. Burns. Protest had been made to Mr. Daugherty by Mr. Gompers and some man by the name of Macauley to the appointment of Burns because of some alleged acts of Mr. Burns some 15 years ago. The acts were denied by Mr. Burns before the committee; the evidence showed that no charges of any nature were ever made against Mr. Burns, much less proven at any time in the matter. A letter was used that had been written by Mr. Daugherty after he had appointed Mr. Burns, in which he stated in effect that he had heard about the allegations before the appointment was made, that he had known Mr. Burns for many, many years, and thought that he would render faithful and efficient service. What nonsense to ask this House to prefer impeachment charges against a Cabinet officer of our Government upon a matter of that kind.

Next specification, No. 4, with reference to the safety laws, was proceeded with. Hon. Charles C. McChord, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was the witness used by Mr. KELLER, and that honorable gentleman by his answers to the questions showed that the enforcement of the laws referred to in this specification was by law in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various United States district attorneys and that the enforcement was in no sense within the purview of the duties of the Attorney General.

Upon this specification Mr. Thomas Stevenson, attorney for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, was also called by Mr. KELLER's attorney. He testified concerning his transactions with the Department of Justice, and that in his judgment Mr. Daugherty had done nothing with reference to the matter referred to in specification No. 4 for which he should be impeached.

At this juncture of the hearings Mr. KELLER dramatically withdrew from the proceedings, refused to testify himself, refused to present further testimony, and Mr. Ralston, his attorney, also withdrew his assistance from the committee after thanking the committee for its courteous treatment.

In my judgment not one single bit of testimony was offered or brought forth even tending to show impeachable conduct on the part of the Attorney General, notwithstanding that the committee let down all the bars in the hearing and let in testimony beyond the bounds of all reason.

Mr. Untermyer had failed to show up at all as counsel or otherwise in the proceedings, but took occasion to have read at some political gathering in Washington while the hearings were in progress an invective against the committee and against the Attorney General's office. Mr. Gompers became conspicuous for his absence. Mr. Vahey was very much non est, and the drama that was staged by Mr. KELLER and Mr. Ralston could not fail to impress one that the entire proceedings were conceived and initiated by designing minds that were entirely hostile to the Attorney General for personal and improper reasons and that the gentleman from Minnesota had been used as a more or less sophisticated instrumentality that seemed wholly ignorant of the necessity of producing evidence to sustain so serious a charge as that of impeachment.

The exit reminded one of the scampering of rodents from a pile of trash that had just been upturned by the broom of a responsible and vigorous housekeeper.

The committee, confronted with such a situation, voted to proceed with the hearings, held them open until all witnesses desiring to be heard had testified, and then publicly closed them. A number of witnesses from the department were called and were subjected to rigid and vigorous cross-examination by the committee. Every charge and every specification was discussed and gone into under oath. Some delays in the Department of Justice were explained and accounted for, but nothing whatever of misconduct of an impeachable nature was uncovered.

As soon as the hearings had been closed the "savage howlings in the moonlight" again set up. Mr. Untermyer began writing the committee; Mr. Ralston wished to again address the committee, make a speech, and argue the law, notwithstanding his ceremonious withdrawal from the proceedings. This was very properly refused.

As to Mr. KELLER, I consider his actions before the committee entirely reprehensible, but I do not wish to lose sight of the question submitted to the committee, which was concerning the official acts of Mr. Daugherty.

Broadly as we considered the matter referred to us, freely as we admitted evidence, we found nothing of an impeachable nature against the Attorney General.

House Resolution 425 should be laid upon the table and the committee discharged.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] seven minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is recognized for seven minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, there may be differences of opinion as to the exact character of the Judiciary Committee in considering impeachment charges, but so far as I am individually concerned I have approached and considered the subject with such a judicial frame of mind as I am capable of. I hope my temper and mind in participating in the investigation was at least with a judicial purpose, if I did fall short of judicial methods and conclusions.

I do not desire to discuss, except incidentally, the conduct of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER]. I make this observation because there is no resolution now pending before the House by which it can deal with the gentleman from Minnesota.

I did not sign this report, because I wished to keep clear and separate the action of the committee in dealing with the impeachment resolution, and its procedure in relation to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER].

The report of the committee is clearly divisible, one portion dealing with the resolution itself and the other portion relating to the misconduct of the Member from Minnesota, and a discussion of the power of the House in dealing with that misconduct. And it was the confusion of the two divisions or aspects of the report that constrained me to withhold my vote thereupon in the committee.

But I had no doubt, and no one else in the committee had, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the charges of impeachment formulated against the Attorney General, and I voted in the committee that there was no evidence to prove or support the offense charged in the proceedings, and I stand upon that now. [Applause.]

I can well appreciate how gentlemen on the committee were disconcerted by the conduct and action of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER]. The bare record discloses but imperfectly human action. One must see it and hear it and handle it, so to speak. I do not wish to be unkind to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] when I observe that his conduct from the very outset was arrogant, truculent, and offensive, and therefore if imprudent expressions fell from the lips of any member of the Judiciary Committee I hope the House will understand that such member had grave and serious provocation, not only in words but in the manner and demeanor of Mr. KELLER himself.

The contention has been made during this debate by asking why should Mr. KELLER have been summoned before the committee when it did not summon other Members of the House. The explanation is very simple and complete, namely, Mr. KELLER declined to make any statement when invited and when he appeared before the committee, and after his declination there was nothing else to do but to ask the House to issue a subpoena for him; whereas these other gentlemen appeared and courteously gave such information as they possessed. When we had reached an impasse with Mr. KELLER, then we had to resort to our constitutional privileges to ascertain what he said he knew but would not divulge.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to express my own conviction as a member of the Judiciary Committee that upon the charges investigated there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the charges of impeachment contained in the resolution or as more particularly made in the supplementary resolution or bill of complaint wherein the charges were made in more concrete and precise form.

I do not desire to discuss the Burns charge save in a general way. My colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and others on the committee, have dealt with that. But I make this statement that the so-called delinquency, misdemeanor, or crime imputed to Mr. Burns occurred some 15 years ago. The Attorney General after the lapse of this long time appointed or retained Mr. Burns, and there is no evidence in this record that since this employment Mr. Burns has rendered other than efficient and honorable service. Now who can rationally or justly contend that such a retention or appointment is impeachable? Should one contend that any public official in making such an appointment, even though it was most unfortunate, had thereby committed a "high crime or misdemeanor"? Should one single solitary wrongful employment constitute a high crime or misdemeanor? It may be a grievous mistake, but is it a crime? Is it an impeachable offense? We should not lightly charge an Attorney General of the United States, whether Republican, Democrat, or Socialist, with "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," and we should at least require the proof and procedure demanded by the ordinary grand jury in investigating similar and other crimes.

I wish to touch one charge upon which more stress was put than was put upon any charge or count in the bill of indictment. That is, that the Attorney General was criminally guilty in not taking appropriate legal steps to bring about a more thorough and frequent inspection of locomotives and railroad machinery during the past recent months.

That charge was pressed with great insistence, as members of the committee know. The charge was that in consequence of this failure of inspection engines or boilers had broken and deaths or injuries had resulted. In this connection I wish to observe that Mr. Stevenson, a lawyer of Chicago, representing the Brotherhood of Engineers and Firemen, an intelligent and zealous lawyer, appeared before the Judiciary Committee, and this important question was asked him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER]. I read from the record:

Mr. FOSTER. In your judgment, knowing the attitude of the Attorney General, do you think his conduct in this matter has been such that in your judgment the Attorney General should be impeached? Give the committee the benefit of your judgment, as you have been in touch with the situation.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a difficult question to answer.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the committee want your judgment.

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I do not think so.

Now, Mr. Stevenson was the counsel for the Brotherhood of Engineers and Firemen, who were more intimately concerned with the inspection of these boilers and machinery than any other class of employees in America, and as their counsel Mr. Stevenson said that Mr. Daugherty should not be impeached for the alleged delinquency in this matter. Such is the record; such is the evidence; and my oath and duty impel me to be governed thereby. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, not being actuated by any overwhelming friendship for the Department of Justice because it has not prosecuted the war profiteers, but relying on the record in this case, I intend to vote to sustain the committee.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is to be regretted that we do not have plenty of time within which to deal with a record of such magnitude and a case of such moment as the one before us. For fear I shall not be able to complete my argument within the time assigned me I now ask unanimous consent, in case necessity requires, to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, it has been charged that extraneous matters have crept into debate; that argument has been had on the constitutional phase of the resolution involving the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] for disobeying the summons. That Members have gone far afield in argument is admitted. But the truth is that the record discloses prima facie—beyond question, I should say—that the Attorney General has at all times been faithful in the fulfillment of his public duties. Therefore that is the reason why gentlemen in debate have dealt with collateral matters.

Mr. Speaker, during the time the Government has existed under the Constitution there have been but a few instances of impeachment, and these in a majority of the cases failed for lack of evidence to support them.

The reason for the comparatively few in number of such cases lies in the fact that officers, whether elected or appointed—in the greatly preponderating majority of cases—have been of unimpeachable character, and the further ground that a Member of Congress could seldom be found willing to assume responsibility for so grave an accusation without first having made careful investigation, in order to ascertain the facts, and mature consideration of such facts, as a justification for the action that he felt, under his oath of office, he was bound to take.

Each Member is the keeper of his own conscience, and the motive of a Member may not be indirectly impugned or questioned in this Chamber.

The charges preferred against Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, seem to have emanated from two principal sources. First, the Attorney General had incurred the displeasure of Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in this, that he had appointed Mr. William J. Burns Director of the Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Gompers had opposed the appointment of Mr. Burns, claiming that the latter was an unfit person for the place by reason of the fact that a former President had pardoned one Jones, convicted of land frauds in Oregon, upon the ground of alleged illegal action of Burns in the selection of prospective jurors in the year 1905, now 18 years ago.

The evidence before us clearly exculpates Mr. Burns from blame in relation to the matter. The enmity between Mr. Burns and Mr. Gompers, it appears, grew out of the prosecution of the McNamaras for dynamiting the Times Building at Los Angeles, when many were killed. Burns swore that Gompers charged him "with railroading these men," and upon learning that they were going to confess their guilt, of sending a man to see them to keep them from so confessing. Gompers denied these charges, and swore that he believed the men innocent until they confessed to their crime.

My judgment is—and I am sustained by the testimony of men of the type of Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, of California—that Burns is a splendid organizer, a thorough investigator, possessed of a remarkably clear intellect, and of fine courage. The fact that for many years Burns had successfully figured in some of the most noted cases of the country, and for a long time had been retained by the American Bankers' Association, coupled with a lifelong personal acquaintance, evidently, in the mind of the Attorney General, outweighed the controvertible accusation made 18 years ago in an ex parte application for pardon by a man under conviction for crime.

The enemies of the Attorney General, therefore, insist that he should be impeached of a high crime and misdemeanor for the reason that he appointed William J. Burns to the office aforementioned. Because a majority of the committee have not been willing to be used as tools by personal enemies of the Attorney General or a member of his force, or by notoriety seekers, or by seekers of mere pelf, they have been characterized by certain blackguards as "whitewashers" and "partisans."

THE UNTERMYER CHARGES.

It appears from the record that there is in New York City a lawyer whose name is Samuel Untermeyer. He seems to be a man of unusual type, a lawyer of ability greater than that of Uriah Heep, somewhat of the style of Oily Gammon. Gammon was a lawyer of profound ability and of the firm of Quirk, Gammon & Snap, a history of whose performances may be found in that entertaining novel for lawyers entitled "Ten Thousand a Year."

Mr. Untermeyer is connected with, or at least "interested in," "Specification No. 1" of the bill of impeachment, which contains 23 counts, called "subdivisions." These counts have a legal ring and were evidently drawn by a special pleader of considerable experience. "Specification No. 1" is of much length and evidently required not a little labor in its preparation. It deals in threatening and high-sounding phrases. The ominous language there employed seems more directed toward terrorizing by its lurid terms the Southern Pine and 10 other lumber associations, the American Tobacco Co., the National Implement & Vehicle Association, and 9 other concerns, making 23 in all, aggregations of large capital, than as being designed as articles of impeachment against Mr. Daugherty. The pleader charges that these organizations are monopolies, operating in restraint of trade, criminal combinations that should be prosecuted and dissolved. It therefore became important for the committee to have all the witnesses whose testimony might shed light on these charges.

The sudden withdrawal of Mr. KELLER from the prosecution and his refusal to respond to the command of the subpoena served upon him by the Sergeant at Arms, his attempt to take refuge, or at least claiming immunity from arrest—he being a Member of the House—under the provisions of the Constitution, coupled with the peculiar actions of the mysterious Mr. Untermeyer, left your committee without knowledge of names of witnesses or other sources of proof of the high crimes and misdemeanors previously alleged against the Attorney General by Mr. KELLER and his adviser, Untermeyer.

I have now arrived at the point in my argument where I propose to undertake to show just what the relation of Mr. Untermeyer was to this proceeding. There was subpoenaed to and printed as a part of the "minority views" two scurrilous letters written by Untermeyer—one dated December 13, 1922, to Mr. KELLER, and the other dated January 4, 1923, to Chairman VOLSTEAD. In the letter to Mr. KELLER, Untermeyer says that he must refuse to have anything to do "with this manifestly biased, prejudicial, white-washing performance, and do not understand what Mr. Ralston meant by connecting me with the inception of this proceeding"; and in the letter to Chairman

VOLSTEAD, Untermyer said, "I had not known Mr. KELLER until after your committee began the inquiry and had never heard of the resolution until a few days prior to the beginning of the hearings before you, and have never to this day read or seen the charges or specifications except as they have been reported in the newspapers," and so forth.

You will have noted the apparent "surprise" of Mr. Untermyer that Mr. Ralston, counsel of record for Mr. Gompers and the American Federation of Labor, should have coupled his name with the proceeding in its incipency. It will be noted also that he denies any knowledge of the charges except as to what he had read in the newspapers. In his letter to Mr. VOLSTEAD he also specifically said, "I am entitled to have the fact recorded that I have at no time, directly or indirectly, had and do not intend to have any professional or other relation to any of the cases under investigation by this department (of Justice)," and so forth. Further, he declares that he "has not at any time sustained any professional relation to Mr. KELLER in this or any other proceeding," except that he had advised him not to waste his time or subject himself to "humiliation" by being "bullyragged" by the Judiciary Committee. Thus it will be seen that Mr. Untermyer disclaims all responsibility, denies all connection, and pretends no interest in the controversy.

If the statements of Mr. Ralston and Mr. KELLER are to be believed, then it follows that the assertions, above mentioned, of Samuel Untermyer are utterly false.

After the appearance of Mr. Jackson H. Ralston, of the Washington bar, attorney for Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Ralston said (hearings, p. 112):

Yes; I was trying to think if I knew of any lawyer. It may be Mr. Untermyer prepared some of the charges; I do not know.

And again, on page 116, Mr. Ralston said:

I want to deal frankly with the committee. So far as those first charges are concerned, I do not expect to deal with them at all. I have not studied them; I did not prepare them—

And then follows the significant language—and Mr. Untermyer is particularly interested in them, and I presume expects or hopes to appear before the committee.

So much for the statement of Mr. Ralston.

Let us now examine the statement of Mr. KELLER. On page 106 of the hearings he says that, in addition to Ralston—there are several other attorneys who have offered to assist in this matter or in certain cases here, and who want to appear before the committee.

I read from page 117 the following:

Mr. HICKEY. I understand, but I thought likely you had some information from those who did prepare them.

Mr. RALSTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask Mr. KELLER.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at the time we had the first hearing, when I appeared before the committee, you set the following Tuesday for me to appear before this committee with the attorney. I saw Mr. Untermyer the following Sunday, and he is the man who is interested in those first charges.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you know about them yourself?

Mr. KELLER. I am not ready to state right now.

Mr. GRAHAM. You preferred these charges. Now, you can not produce the evidence that moved you to make these solemn and serious charges against a public official on the floor of Congress.

Mr. KELLER. I will be ready when I get ready.

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, no you won't; do not get impudent with the committee.

Mr. KELLER. I say I am not prepared this morning to take them up. I am simply answering a question of Mr. FOSTER, and that is on the following Monday I said when I appeared before this committee, Mr. Untermyer would have been ready on Tuesday to come here and answer these charges. This committee adjourned until December 4. Now, Mr. Untermyer is in such shape that he can not appear at any particular time and take care of these particular charges.

Mr. GRAHAM. May I ask a question at this point? Mr. KELLER, you say you consulted Mr. Untermyer when?

Mr. KELLER. The first time was on a Sunday following the meeting on September 16.

Mr. GRAHAM. Who prepared these specifications?

Mr. KELLER. What specifications—these here?

Mr. GRAHAM. There are only one set of specifications here.

Mr. KELLER. Those specifications were prepared by myself and some assistants.

Mr. GRAHAM. By yourself?

Mr. KELLER. And some assistants.

Mr. GRAHAM. And some assistants. Who assisted you?

Mr. KELLER. I do not care to say this morning who all of those were.

Mr. GRAHAM. Why not?

Mr. KELLER. Why should I?

Mr. GRAHAM. Because you are asked, and the committee wants to know.

Mr. RALSTON. I must again object.

Further testimony to the same effect is to be found on page 119 of the hearings, reading as follows:

Mr. RALSTON. No; I think Mr. VOLSTEAD was perfectly informed as to that.

Mr. FOSTER. But could you or Mr. KELLER indicate at this time how soon Mr. Untermyer might be here to take care of specification No. 1? Is that not a fair and honest question?

Mr. RALSTON. It is absolutely fair, and if it is in my power and if I can—

Mr. FOSTER (interposing). I wonder if Mr. KELLER would care to indicate how soon we could proceed to No. 1, if it was necessary to have Mr. Untermyer here.

Mr. KELLER. I could not.

Mr. FOSTER. Does Mr. Untermyer represent you in this charge?

Mr. KELLER. I do not know whether he does or not; he does in certain ones, and he was willing to appear before this committee on a date set in last September.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask you another question: Six days ago the committee decided to start on No. 1 this morning; from that time to this have you advised with Mr. Untermyer to see whether he would be here this morning?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; he said he could not be here this morning.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you get the information from Mr. KELLER, because he is the man that has been in touch with Mr. Untermyer, whoever he may be; the man, as I infer, who wrote the specifications; and I suggest that you develop the facts from Mr. KELLER as to when he is going to present the evidence on those specifications and get the names of the witnesses; so that we will not have to sit here day after day, week after week, and perhaps month after month letting this thing run on, like Tennyson's "Brook," forever. Let us have the names of the witnesses as you pass over the specifications?

To this suggestion Mr. KELLER made no response, thereby acquiescing in the statement that Untermyer had prepared the specifications.

In the face of the testimony which I have read, could anyone entertain a reasonable doubt as to the fact that Untermyer, during this entire proceeding, has been lurking in the background, and that when it came time for the gentlemen to show their hands, that under the advice of Untermyer, the dramatic withdrawal of KELLER was staged under cover of the "smoke screen" of abuse of the committee by the two individuals concerned?

The testimony which I have read in your presence not only establishes the interest of Untermyer in the proceeding, but also serves to illustrate the conduct of Mr. KELLER before the committee and to indicate the impediments that retarded the committee in their effort to discover the truth of the charges.

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to take up another phase of Mr. Untermyer's letter to Chairman VOLSTEAD, which has a personal relation to myself, as is manifest from an excerpt from the Untermyer letter reading thus:

In so far as this record contains untruthful, slurring remarks interjected by your members referring to me, I herewith request to have made part of that record my protest against these remarks, for the reasons hereinafter stated, and demand that they be stricken from the record.

The following is a fair sample of the unpardonable performance against which my protest is directed:

Mr. CHANDLER. Would you mind telling the committee whether Mr. Untermyer has any intention to appear here?

Mr. HAYWARD. I have no idea and have not had from the beginning that Mr. Untermyer would appear.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is your opinion that he will not?

Mr. HAYWARD. It is my opinion that he will not unless he is subpoenaed and brought here.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Or retained. [Laughter.]

I assume from the press reports of the answer of the Attorney General to the charges that in venturing this baseless insinuation Mr. GOODYKOONTZ took his cue from the "speech" interpolated by the Attorney General in that answer, in which he recklessly assailed the motive of everyone who had criticized his administration with being in the pay of war profiteers and other offenders whom he is pursuing with such "relentless zeal" that it is a safe prediction that he will go out of office without having punished one of them.

Untermyer saw fit to use my harmless expression as an excuse for writing the committee a letter of abuse and villification. Amid the dimming smoke of his verbosity may be found, inter alia, the following choice words and phrases, viz, "unpardonable performance," "baseless insinuation," "pretended motive," "brazen cupidity," "flagrant partisanship," "frantic efforts to whitewash," "cheap assaults," "carnival of abuse," "manifestations of its bias and animus," "scurrilous remarks," and so forth. These are some of the epithets employed by Untermyer.

It may be, after all is said and done, that the reason why Mr. Untermyer flew into such a rage over the suggestion of a retainer was that he felt that he had not been treated just right. Had he not been counsel for the Lockwood committee? Having a dislike for the Attorney General, would he not, in his own estimation, be the very man the committee should select, especially as KELLER was not authorized to pay out funds for such a purpose? The suspicion that Untermyer may have entertained the thought of being retained is somewhat confirmed by the suggestion contained in his letter to the chairman, "When Mr. KELLER retired why did your committee not report back the resolution with the charges unproven or ask authority to employ counsel to prepare and present the proofs?" Mr. Untermyer must have had some object or design, else he would not have worried so much about the case.

The abusive language of this monumental egotist is sufficient evidence of the fact that he is a common blackguard and an assassin of character. But he is much more than that—far worse. When Captain Boy-Ed, the notorious naval attaché of the German Embassy, was captured, an official report was found on his person explaining a statement he had issued abusing the American people which reads in part as follows:

Every statement was drawn up by Counsel Samuel Untermyer. He was, at the time of my stay in New York, the unpaid juridical and legal-political adviser of the Imperial embassy.

This shows that Mr. Untermyer loved the enemies of our country so well that he was willing to serve them without pay.

Again, here is an excerpt from the diary of Chief Privy Counselor Albert, engaged here in German intrigue, reading thus:

In other respects this Easter festival passed off somewhat anxiously, since at noon I was summoned to Plainfield to Hagedorns and in the evening to Untermyer at his estate at Greystone. I drove there, and had no reason to repent this meeting brought about for business reasons. Untermyer is personally a by no means unpleasant individual, shrewd, very familiar with political affairs, and in a business sense extraordinarily well up to date. He has a wonderful estate in the neighborhood of Yonkers, on the heights of the Hudson. Opposite are the Palisades of the other bank, over which the sun went down in wonderful clearness. Conversation on the prevention of the export of ammunition and other political questions. Viereck was also present.

Albert, Viereck, and Untermyer conversing on the prevention of the export of ammunition—the great German triumvirate.

Here is what A. Mitchell Palmer had to say of the man Untermyer, who has sought to castigate with his sharp tongue the lawyers' committee of the House:

I have incurred the undying animosity of the enemies of our country and the violators of her laws, their friends, and counsel. I have been officially denounced in Germany in language very much like that which Mr. Untermyer now employs. The friends of Lenin and Trotsky, Emma Goldman, and Alexander Berkman charge my department with violations of the Constitution, which they despise, and call me a "menace" to the institutions which they frankly seek to destroy. I am proud of these enemies. I point to them as conclusive evidence of the character of a work which merits and receives their disapproval.

It is a fact that during the most perilous period in the country's history German officers were "canoodling" with Untermyer and clinking glasses at Greystone estate.

On the subject of the business morals and professional deportment of Samuel Untermyer I refer to the case of See v. Heppenheimer et al. in the Court of Chancery of New Jersey, decided April 3, 1905, reported in Sixty-first Atlantic Reporter, page 843. Vice Chancellor Pitney, writing the opinion of the court, said of Untermyer and his associates, Beard and Stein. [Reading from p. 854:]

The remaining five mills were optioned on a different basis and were finally purchased on special terms, and their purchase forms by itself the basis of a charge of actual fraud upon the corporation practiced by the three gentlemen whom I join with plaintiff's counsel in calling the promoters of this enterprise.

And further the court said:

Mr. Untermyer raised much more than his share. He took $500,000 of bonds with the accompanying stock bonus for his firm in payment of its fee, and besides that duly marketed by himself and his friends $467,000 of bonds. * * * This seems to have been accomplished by the aid of an ingenious and elaborate prospectus, gotten up by Mr. Untermyer with the aid of one of his western associates.

Again, on page 858, it is said, by way of conclusion:

Now it seems to me impossible to avoid the conclusion from those facts that the contract procured to be adopted by this board of directors on the very day on which they were elected by the management of these three men whose names have just been mentioned and under the personal supervision of Messrs. Beard and Untermyer, and the formal contract entered into in pursuance of it, was a palpable fraud upon the act of the legislature, and was entirely unwarranted thereby and operated as a fraud not only on the stockholders of the company, as was distinctly held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the opinion so often referred to, but especially on the future creditors of the company.

The action of the authors of the minority report in making conspicuous the slanderous attack of the man on the integrity of the members of the committee whose opinion did not harmonize with theirs has made it my unpleasant duty to give so much time to the subject.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall not dwell further upon that phase. I only want to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the Attorney General's office gave every opportunity to the committee to examine or investigate every record which it had. During the first few days of the hearing counsel for Mr. KELLER called for particular documents, and all of such documents were produced. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] desired access to some of the records. I want to say for Mr. WOODRUFF that he was very cautious in saying that in examining such records he proposed to keep inviolate the tenor and nature of them, that there would be no leakage. He was given that privilege and he went to the Department of Justice and examined such records as he wanted to see, and was permitted, I believe, to produce certain of them. The deportment of Mr. WOODRUFF before our committee was good. He acted as a representative of his people. I find no fault with him. Likewise was the conduct of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. The trouble we had was with Mr. KELLER. He exhausted our patience. We gave him great latitude. Our reward was his generous abuse. May I thank the gentlemen who have granted unto me the portion of time allotted to them for use in this debate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the matter now under consideration is of vast importance to the Republic. The Member of this body who speaks lightly of his Government, who deprecates the motives of the officials whose duty it is to administer our laws, should at all times speak advisedly, and he who speaks otherwise is doing his country an irreparable injury. The limited time allowed for debate makes it impossible to discuss this resolution in detail; however, under the privilege granted, I shall in a general way discuss the entire proceedings.

On September 11, 1922, Mr. KELLER, a Representative from the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, arose in his seat in this body and said:

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I impeach Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, for high crime and misdemeanors in office. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on that high privilege.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman arises to a question of this high privilege, he ought to present definite charges at the outset.

Mr. KELLER. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will do so.

First, Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has used his high office to violate the Constitution of the United States in the following particulars:

- (1) By abridging freedom of speech.
- (2) By abridging the freedom of the press.
- (3) By abridging the right of people peaceably to assemble.

Second. That, unmindful of the duties of his office and his oath to defend the Constitution of the United States, and unmindful of his obligations to discharge those duties faithfully and impartially, the said Harry M. Daugherty has, in his capacity of Attorney General of the United States, conducted himself in a manner arbitrary, oppressive, unjust, and illegal.

Third. He has, without warrant, threatened with punishment citizens of the United States who have opposed his attempts to override the Constitution and the laws of this Nation.

Fourth. He has used the funds of his office illegally and without warrant in the prosecution of individuals and organizations for certain lawful acts which, under the law, he was specifically forbidden to prosecute.

Fifth. He has failed to prosecute individuals and organizations violating the law after those violations have become public scandal.

Sixth. He has defeated the ends of justice by recommending the release from prison of wealthy offenders against the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Seventh. He has failed to prosecute defendants legally indicted for crimes against the people.

I offer, therefore, the following resolution and am prepared to appear before a committee of the House, there to produce evidence and witnesses in proof of my charges.

The resolution offered was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the said Harry M. Daugherty has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oaths to witnesses.

By a vote of the House the resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. KELLER presumably prepared this resolution. He selected the Judiciary Committee of the House as the committee before which he wanted to present his evidence. His resolution was referred to the committee of his choice, as mentioned in his resolution. Mr. KELLER asked that the resolution be passed, instructing the Judiciary Committee to proceed with this investigation. The House, however, referred the resolution to the committee, which action was tantamount to demurring to the sufficiency of the resolution, and following some previous precedents established by the House in impeachment proceedings. It seemed to be the duty of the committee to determine in a general way whether or not the charges made by Mr. KELLER had any weight in fact.

The committee met on September 16, 1922, for the purpose of hearing Mr. KELLER on his charge. He appeared before the committee with a written statement, which he proceeded to read, but insisted that he was not prepared on that day to introduce any proof or evidence to substantiate his charges, and refused to divulge any of the evidence or the names of his witnesses, and insisted further that the committee should have authority to subpoena witnesses before he would introduce any proof. Among other things, he said:

I fully appreciate the gravity of the charges which I have preferred against the Attorney General. It is because of their very gravity and seriousness that I demanded upon the floor of the House not an investigation but the formal procedure of impeachment. I am prepared at the appropriate time to present witnesses and documentary evidence to sustain every charge that I make, but I demand that when such evidence is presented it shall be in public hearings, so that the American people may know whether or not my charges were sustained,

Mr. KELLER insisted that there was but one point before the committee at that hearing, and that was that the committee should get full authority from the House to subpoena witnesses before he proceeded, and said:

I am ready whenever you say to present evidence, when you are prepared to hear such evidence and when I can present such witnesses, and when I can subpoena them.

Referring to the charges made he said:

I assume the responsibility of whether they are true or not. I am ready to present evidence that they are true at the proper time.

At this hearing Mr. KELLER insisted that—

My charges are very specific before the House. * * * I am not prepared to-day to bring such proceedings, because I did not know what the committee really wanted; but I still claim that I made those charges and am ready to prove them before the proper committee. * * * I made those charges, and I say they are true; and, as a Member of Congress, I say to you, gentlemen, that they are true, and all I ask of you men is that you get the proper committee so that I can present the evidence to prove that the charges are true. * * * What are you going to do with that resolution? That resolution, when I introduced it in the House, provided the machinery for the committee that I intended to appear before to present my case and my evidence to prove that my charges are true.

Mr. DYER. Have you anything at all in your possession now to substantiate the charges which you made against the Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. KELLER. Oh, yes; I have it.

Mr. DYER. Well, present it.

Mr. KELLER. I do not want to present it until I consult counsel again.

In short, Mr. KELLER insisted throughout this hearing that he was not prepared to introduce any proof, and asked for time.

Give me a reasonable time and I will present proof. * * * I have made charges; they are true; I can prove them. * * * I am willing, if given reasonable time to prepare and get counsel, to appear before the committee and bring whatever evidence you want.

It was insisted that he could not be ready before the following Thursday, when it was known that the Congress had determined to adjourn not later than the following Saturday, and, therefore, that it would be impossible to go into this hearing. The committee did not grant an adjournment until Thursday, but set the hearing for the following Tuesday, and at the Tuesday meeting continued the hearing until December 4, in order that Mr. KELLER might be given sufficient time during the recess of Congress to get together his proof and be fully prepared to substantiate his charges before the committee, and, as he suggested, before the country. His last words to the committee on that date were:

You set the day, and I will produce all the evidence you wish.

On November 23 Mr. KELLER was called upon for a more specific statement in writing of the general charges which he had made and designated as constituting high crimes and misdemeanors. On December 1 he furnished the committee with an amplified statement of his general charges. This statement consisted of 14 specifications, and the several specifications embraced numerous subdivisions.

On December 4, the date set for the hearing, Mr. KELLER appeared before the committee and said, in part—

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have complied with the wishes of the committee in filing the bill of particulars as you requested. Those were prepared by men who are interested in this impeachment proceeding with me and certain lawyers and attorneys in briefing it. * * * My resolution is before you. I feel I will not do anything more than what I have filed now until you pass that resolution, which will give you authority to subpoena witnesses and such papers as you need.

Here Mr. KELLER took his stand and refused to proceed further with the hearings until the committee had secured authority from the House to subpoena witnesses. The committee complied with this request, returned to the House, and got the authority desired by Mr. KELLER. When questioned as to when he would be ready to proceed with the hearing he replied:

Within a reasonable time—next week.

Again he was asking for delay and at the same time criticizing the committee through the newspapers for the delay. At this same hearing Mr. KELLER said:

If the committee had not called upon me a few days ago by resolution to file a bill of particulars, I would have filed them to-day in the same manner as I have filed them upon the call of the committee; therefore, that would not change the situation at all.

One day he is insisting that his first charges are sufficient and is complaining because he is called upon to file more specific charges, and the next day, guided by the exigencies of the occasion, he is insisting that he intended all along to file a specific bill of particulars.

At this hearing Mr. KELLER was accompanied by his attorney, Mr. Jackson H. Ralston, who also appeared for Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor, as shown by Mr. Gompers in his testimony. When it was found that Mr. KELLER was not prepared to introduce any evidence and asked for more time, the committee adjourned the hearing until December 12, at which time Mr. KELLER again appeared, accompanied by his attorney, Mr. Ralston. On this occasion it was suggested that the proof be heard in an orderly way, commencing with specification No. 1. To this Mr. KELLER and his attorney objected and insisted upon introducing proof in such a manner and in such order as they thought advisable. The committee acceded to this desire and it was arranged that proof was to be heard first on specifications Nos. 13, 4, and 7.

No. 13, in short, charges the Attorney General with knowingly appointing William J. Burns at the head of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, alleging that Mr. Burns was an unfit man for the position. The only evidence introduced to substantiate this charge was evidence calculated to show that in 1907 Mr. Burns had committed fraud in assisting in the selection of a jury in the prosecution of one Jones charged with a violation of the laws of the United States and tried in the State of Oregon. Jones was convicted but never went to prison, his case being continually before the courts until 1912, when his attorneys made application for a pardon. The matter was investigated by Mr. Lynch, the United States pardon attorney, who prepared a detailed statement showing that in his opinion Jones had not had a fair trial. This statement, together with all the papers in the case, was placed by Lynch before Mr. Wickersham, the Attorney General, who, after investigating all the papers presented to him by Lynch, signed the statement recommending the pardon of Jones. This statement was in turn presented to President Taft, who, relying upon the statement, pardoned Jones. Before Burns's appointment Samuel Gompers and Mr. Wickersham protested to Mr. Daugherty against the appointment, and Senator Hiram Johnson recommended and insisted upon the appointment. One McCauley, from Toronto, Canada, wrote the Attorney General, after the appointment, protesting the fitness of Burns. One Joyce, a private detective in the city of Washington, and formerly connected with the Department of Justice as a subordinate under Burns, testified to one incident wherein he thought that Burns had acted wrongly. This constituted the evidence introduced by Mr. KELLER to substantiate this charge.

Mr. Burns took the stand himself, testified fully in reference to the charge, and said, among other things:

"I want to say for myself personally that I will be glad on the witness stand here to lay myself open for any examination they may see, or anybody else may see, fit to ask me, and I am perfectly willing that they should go into every day of my life and my record." It is noteworthy that Mr. Ralston, the attorney for Mr. KELLER, did not see fit to ask Mr. Burns a single question on cross-examination.

Conceding for the purpose of this case that Mr. Burns did do all the things charged against him in the Jones case in 1907, and going further and admitting that he was guilty of an offense at that time—however, it is significant that no criminal charge was ever made against Mr. Burns—in my judgment, the Attorney General would not be impeachable because 15 years later he appointed Mr. Burns to a position of responsibility. In my own State, in my home city, we had a mayor who defrauded the city out of a number of thousands of dollars, and then absconded. He was later apprehended, convicted, served 10 years in the penitentiary, returned to civil life, became one of the leading citizens in the State, and in less than 10 years after leaving the prison was appointed by the governor as president of the board of control of the prison in which he had served. There was never a better man served on that board, and it would be preposterous to even suggest that the Governor of Michigan was impeachable because he appointed that man to high office.

Mr. KELLER next introduced evidence to substantiate specification No. 4 of his charges, which in substance charged the Attorney General with misconduct in that he failed to enforce the boiler inspection law. It was made clear by witnesses called by Mr. Ralston that there had been a laxity in fulfillment of strict requirements of certain safety appliance statutes after the inception of the strike of the railroad shopmen on July 1, 1922; that conditions were better after September 1, 1922. It was made clear that under the law about 50 Government inspectors are charged with the duty of inspecting locomotives and that there are about 70,000 railroad locomotives in use; that in addition to the inspection made by Government inspectors, a duty is imposed upon the railroads to inspect their own engines; that some of these roads, at a time when they were having much difficulty in keeping their trains moving owing to the strike, had failed to make proper inspection.

It was also made clear that in the enforcement of the penal sections of the law, where a violation has occurred, that it is the duty of the chief of the Inspection Bureau, operating under the Interstate Commerce Commission, to enforce the statute; that is, that this inspector reports the matter to the United States district attorney in the locality where the violation occurs, and it is the duty of that district attorney to prosecute, and is not the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute in these cases, therefore the Attorney General was in no way derelict of duty in not enforcing the statutes in reference to boiler inspections. I think a careful reading of the testimony of Commissioner McChord and Mr. Ralston's observations will establish this contention beyond peradventure.

It was next contended that it was the duty of the Attorney General to bring proceedings in equity and by means of an injunction to compel the railroads which were not complying with the law to comply with the law and make proper inspection. In this connection Mr. Thomas Stevenson, of Cleveland, Ohio, attorney for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, was sworn as a witness. Mr. Stevenson is undoubtedly a clean-cut, capable lawyer, and impressed the committee with his apparent desire to be frank and at the same time never for an instant neglecting to take advantage of anything that might be favorable to his client. Mr. Stevenson's testimony thoroughly convinces one that there is a close legal question as to whether or not an injunction, as contended for by Mr. KELLER's attorney, would lie. At the time of the hearing the Attorney General's office was in communication with Attorney Stevenson and Mr. Horn, attorney for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and an effort was being made to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not an injunction could be upheld.

After Mr. Stevenson had testified at length and presented his viewpoint from all angles he was asked these questions:

Mr. HOWLAND. And do you not believe—I am going to ask you this question, because you have expressed opinions here—that the Attorney General is ready, willing, and anxious to assist you in every way within his power to get the relief that you ask for?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no reason to think otherwise.
Mr. FOSTER. In your judgment, knowing the attitude of the Attorney General, do you think his conduct in this matter has been such that, in your judgment, as the Attorney General he should be impeached? Give the committee the benefit of your judgment. You have been in touch with the situation.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a difficult question to answer.
Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the committee just wants your judgment.
Mr. STEVENSON. No; I do not think so.

I feel safe in saying there was not a member on the committee or a spectator who heard Mr. Stevenson testify but who was impressed with his candor, sincerity, and intelligence, and when Mr. Stevenson, the chosen representative of the firemen who were operating the engines the inspection of which was the question involved, and a man who had given the subject as much study as any other man in the country, was of the opinion that the conduct of the Attorney General in this particular was not such as to warrant impeachment, it little lies in the mouth of the uninformed to make such charges.

The next witness was Mr. Arthur J. Lovell, vice president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, who testified as to the accidents happening on various railroads during the last few months; and at the conclusion of his testimony Mr. Ralston said:

I have just received a request from Mr. KELLER, asking me for a suspension of about 15 minutes for the purpose of consultation as to the next step, if the committee will take a recess for that time.

The committee took a recess, and in about 30 minutes Mr. KELLER and Mr. Ralston returned to the room. Mr. KELLER insisted upon reading a statement which he had prepared. The committee did not see fit to hear the statement at that time unless Mr. KELLER desired to be sworn as a witness. He insisted on reading his statement, refused to be sworn, condemned the committee, threw his statement on the desk in front of the chairman, and stalked from the room, and from that time has refused to have anything further to do with the proceedings. The statement which he desired to read and which was left with the committee was simply a tirade against the committee, formally announcing his withdrawal from the proceedings, and repeating his statements, which he had previously given out to the newspapers, that the committee was "packed" and that it was evident that Mr. Daugherty was to be "whitewashed."

Mr. Donald R. Richberg, attorney for the defendants in the Chicago injunction suit, was subpoenaed as a witness by Mr. KELLER. Mr. Richberg said:

I would like to state my position briefly, so there might be no misunderstanding of it. I am here in response to a subpoena issued. I understand, by the committee. I have had nothing to do with the investigation or institution of these charges. I am not here in any way as an attorney representing any prosecutor. I am in the position of an attorney in a pending case brought by the Attorney General, which is made the subject of one of the charges here. Under those circumstances, I doubt the propriety of my taking any part in any way in prosecuting charges against the Attorney General. I have no desire voluntarily to submit any testimony.

Mr. Richberg further stated that he had no evidence or information bearing upon the charge other than that which he had filed in the defense in the injunction suit in the Chicago court, and the committee agreed with Mr. Richberg that he should not be compelled to try before the committee his case which was pending before the court, and Mr. Richberg was therefore excused.

I have discussed only testimony presented by Mr. KELLER, and time forbids reference to further testimony introduced on the remaining specifications. Suffice it to say, however, that the remainder of the testimony was introduced by the attorney for the Attorney General explaining in detail each and every one of the charges made, and from that testimony but one conclusion can be drawn.

Some months ago Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota and Mr. WOODRUFF, of Michigan, had made charges on the floor of the House in reference to the prosecution of certain war-fraud cases, and Mr. WOODRUFF, of Michigan, had requested the committee that he might be permitted to present evidence when the Keller charges were heard. In consideration of these facts these gentlemen were requested to present to the committee any evidence in their possession tending to substantiate any of the charges made by Mr. KELLER against the Attorney General. Both gentlemen appeared. Mr. WOODRUFF said in part:

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to state now that I had nothing whatever to do with the preferment of these charges of impeachment. I knew nothing about it until after it had been done; I had nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the bill of particulars; I did not see that bill of particulars until after it had been submitted to the public; I assume no responsibility whatever for anything that may appear in that bill of particulars. As regards the specifications 1 to 13, I know practically nothing and can give very little, if any, assistance on those specifications. I do have some information about one of the subdivisions of specification 14, and I am prepared to assist the committee in determining the merits of that particular subdivision.

Mr. WOODRUFF requested permission to see certain files and documents in the Attorney General's office bearing upon certain matters which he had referred to in his charges on the floor of the House. At his request, together with his attorney, Captain Schafe, a former employee of the Department of Justice, he was permitted to go to the department and inspect such files and documents as he desired, and after such inspection returned to the committee and stated the results of his inquiry, from which it was apparent to all that Mr. WOODRUFF had no information which would aid the committee in determining whether or not the Attorney General was guilty of the charges made against him by Mr. KELLER.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota said in part:

It should be said in the beginning that at no time have I ever had any connection with these impeachment charges; I did not know that they were to be filed; I never saw them before they were filed; no one ever consulted me concerning them; I knew nothing about them until they were presented to the House.

It should be said that, in my opinion, these charges are not based either on law or facts.

I would say that I not only have no proof on those charges but there are many of them with which I have absolutely no sympathy.

In determining whether or not any proof has been introduced establishing Mr. KELLER's contention that the Attorney General has been guilty of "high crimes and misdemeanors," it becomes important to know just what this phrase contemplates. Article II of section 4 of the Constitution defines impeachable offenses as "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." A judicial construction of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" as a definition of an impeachable offense is, from the nature of impeachment trials, impossible; and we must therefore have recourse to textbook authority for this definition.

Black, in his work on constitutional law, says:

Treason and bribery are well-defined crimes. But the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors" is so very indefinite that practically it is not susceptible of exact definition or limitation, but the power of impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or laws which, in the judgment of the House, is deserving of punishment by this means, or is of such a character as to render the party accused unfit to hold and exercise his office.

I have no hesitancy in saying that, in my judgment, absolutely no evidence has been introduced which would tend in the remotest degree to prove that the Attorney General had been guilty of "high crimes and misdemeanors." I hold no brief for Mr. Daugherty. Whether or not he is a highly competent Attorney General, or whether or not his selection to that high office was a wise selection, are matters beside the question, and were not before the committee, and are not before the House at this time. We have but one question to decide. We are not passing upon the conduct of Mr. KELLER, and that conduct should have no bearing upon our verdict, and I feel sure has not entered into the conclusion of the committee.

Personally, I have no knowledge as to whether or not Mr. KELLER was the tool of others in the institution of these proceedings, and make no such charges. I do say, however, that Mr. KELLER displayed a woeful lack of information about the specific charges which he made, and his conduct from the beginning up to the time he dramatically bolted from the committee room bears every indication of the fact that his hope at every stage of the proceeding was that the committee would refuse to tolerate his conduct so that he might withdraw and charge "whitewash." If this was his thought he was disappointed, because all rules of evidence were waived aside, he was permitted to proceed in his own manner, and he had his own way, and no one familiar with the record will contend that any evidence had been introduced up to the time of his exit. From the beginning he sought publicity and was quoted often in the press, but he failed utterly to prove any of the things he charged. I do not want to condemn him. My information is that shortly after he withdrew from these proceedings he suffered a nervous breakdown, and is now in the South recuperating, and it is my hope that he speedily recovers.

The Judiciary Committee of the House is a bipartisan committee made up of Republicans and Democrats. The personnel of the committee was determined at the beginning of the Sixty-seventh Congress, but many members of the committee have served for years, and the personnel has not changed, with the exception of the addition of one member who filled a vacancy on the committee, since this impeachment resolution was presented to the House. A "packed committee" is, therefore, out of the question. These charges are not sustained.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker on the first day of July, 1922, while the great railroads of this Nation were transporting coal and food to the industries and homes of our people, 260,000 members of the railway shop crafts went out on a strike.

It was the work and duty of these striking shopmen to inspect and repair the locomotives and rolling stock of the railroads. The law imposed severe penalties upon railroads using defective locomotives that had not been properly inspected. The railroads immediately sought to obtain new shopmen by calling to the service blacksmiths and mechanics who were out of employment and eager to obtain these desirable positions. If the railroads were successful in their efforts the result would be to make the strike ineffective. The strikers were desperate and thereupon by intimidation, force, and violence sought to prevent these strike breakers, so-called, from making the necessary inspection and repairs to the locomotives and rolling stock of the great transportation lines. In this they were partially successful in tying up almost completely the great railroad lines of the country and under the law effectually prevented the use of 70,000 locomotives, as the railroads must violate the law if they did not have the usual inspection of their rolling stock. To make this strike effective in every way and to prevent the transportation of mails, coal, or food the striking shopmen with the aid of their sympathizers sought every opportunity to injure the rolling stock and locomotives of the roads and to willfully and deliberately bring about defective safety appliances and to completely paralyze railroad traffic until the wages demanded by them had been granted by the managers of the railroads.

So critical and serious a condition developed from these unlawful acts of the strikers that President Harding on the 18th day of August went before Congress with a special message in which he called the attention of both Houses to this national crisis that threatened the life of the Nation in the following words:

Sympathetic strikes have developed here and there, seriously impairing interstate commerce. Deserted transcontinental trains in the desert regions of the Southwest have revealed the cruelty and contempt for law on the part of some railway employees, who have conspired to paralyze transportation, and lawlessness and violence in a hundred places have revealed the failure of the striking unions to hold their forces to law observance. Men who refused to strike and who have braved insult and assault and risked their lives to serve a public need have been cruelly attacked and wounded or killed. Men seeking work and guards attempting to protect lives and property, even officers of the Federal Government, have been assaulted, humiliated, and hindered in their duties. Strikers have armed themselves and gathered in mobs about railroad shops to offer armed violence to any man attempting to go to work. There is a state of lawlessness shocking to every conception of American law and order and violating the cherished guaranties of American freedom. At no time has the Federal Government been unready or unwilling to give its support to maintain law and order and restrain violence, but in no case has State authority confessed its inability to cope with the situation and asked for Federal assistance.

Under these conditions of hindrance and intimidation there has been such a lack of care of motive power that the deterioration of locomotives and the noncompliance with the safety requirements of the law are threatening the breakdown of transportation. This very serious menace is magnified by the millions of losses to fruit growers and other producers of perishable foodstuffs, and comparable losses to farmers who depend on transportation to market their grains at harvest time. Even worse, it is hindering the transport of available coal when industry is on the verge of paralysis because of coal shortage, and life and health are menaced by coal famine in the great centers of population. Surely the threatening conditions must impress the Congress and the country that no body of men, whether limited in numbers and responsible for railway management or powerful in numbers and the necessary forces in railroad operation, shall be permitted to choose a course which so imperils public welfare. Neither organizations of employers nor workmen's unions may escape responsibility. When related to a public service the mere fact of organization magnifies that responsibility, and public interest transcends that of either grouped capital or organized labor.

Another development is so significant that the hardships of the moment may well be endured to rivet popular attention to necessary settlement. It is fundamental to all freedom that all men have unquestioned rights to lawful pursuits, to work and to live and choose their own lawful ways to happiness. In these strikes these rights have been denied by assault and violence, by armed lawlessness. In many communities the municipal authorities have winked at these violations, until liberty is a mockery and the law a matter of community contempt. It is fair to say that the great mass of organized workmen do not approve, but they seem helpless to hinder. These conditions can not remain in free America. If free men can not toll according to their own lawful choosing, all our constitutional guaranties born of democracy are surrendered to mobocracy and the freedom of a hundred millions is surrendered to the small minority which would have no law.

It is not my thought to ask Congress to deal with these fundamental problems at this time. No hasty action would contribute to the solution of the present critical situation. There is existing law by which to settle the prevailing disputes. There are statutes forbidding conspiracy to hinder interstate commerce. There are laws to assure the highest possible safety in railway service. It is my purpose to invoke these laws, civil and criminal, against all offenders alike.

In this great crisis the settlement of which meant so much to the life of the Nation, the President and Congress turned instinctively to that great lawyer, Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty, who, when he assumed the duties of his great office, said:

My duty is clear. As long as I am the responsible head of the Department of Justice the law will be enforced with all the power possessed by the Government which I am at liberty to call to my command.

The Government will endure on the rock of law enforcement or it will perish in the quicksands of lawlessness.

The Attorney General at once sent his agents and assistants over the Nation to investigate and obtain evidence of the unlawful acts of the striking shopmen and their sympathizers, that he might go before the courts with that evidence and obtain the necessary relief. It was a tremendous undertaking, but so successfully did he accomplish his great task that on the 1st day of September he appeared before the Federal court at Chicago with evidence of 17,000 unlawful acts committed by these striking shopmen against the transportation lines of the country and in violation of interstate commerce, committed for the purpose of destroying the railroads. Upon this great mass of evidence he requested of the court an injunction against these striking shopmen and their sympathizers, enjoining them from further interference with the railroads and thus effectively preventing them from committing further acts of violence upon men who had taken the places in the railroad shops of the strikers. In his argument before the court to obtain that injunction, he used these memorable words:

I will use the power of the Government of the United States within my power to prevent the labor unions of the country from destroying the open shop.

When the unions claim the right to dictate to the Government and dominate the American people and to deprive the American people of the necessities, then the Government will destroy the unions, for the Government of the United States is supreme and must endure.

A preliminary restraining order was granted by the court, and for the time being the nation-wide plot on the part of radical labor to force the railroads into Government ownership failed. Efficient men under the protection of this injunction took the places of the striking shopmen, and the roads resumed their customary traffic. The Government at Washington still lived, and the Attorney General received the commendation of all law-abiding people.

Radical labor leaders, however, were not to be easily defeated. Through their attorneys and official heads they immediately applied to the Attorney General to bring injunction proceedings against the railroads to prevent them from using any locomotives or rolling stock that had not been inspected according to law and demanded of him that under like injunction proceedings he restrain and enjoin the railroads in such a manner that would again completely paralyze the traffic.

They said to him, in substance, you have obtained an injunction against the shopmen. Now get one against the railroads. The Attorney General, after consulting with his assistants, reported that in his view of the law he could not legally obtain such an injunction, but that he would do all in his power to see that any willful violations of the law on the part of the railroads should be at once punished and that all safety appliances should be inspected and made safe in accordance with the Federal statutes, and he at once instructed his assistant attorneys general throughout the United States to see that these laws were complied with.

Leaders in this great railroad strike were now desperate. Something must be done to obtain Government ownership of railroads. The Attorney General had refused to aid them in overturning and destroying the Government. The court had fixed September 11 for a final hearing to make the injunction permanent. The Attorney General must be destroyed. He must be humiliated and ridiculed in the eyes of the people. Congress must impeach him. Such proceedings must start in the House of Representatives. Some one must be found in that body that would commence the proceedings—some one that President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, could command and control. The only Member of the House available to do this bidding of the strikers was the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER].

This was Mr. KELLER's second term. In his official biography, based on information furnished by himself, in the Congressional Directory, he states that he—lost the Republican nomination in the convention, but was persuaded by his friends to run as an independent, and with the support of labor was elected.

He claims that he is neither a Democrat nor a Republican but an independent.

During his service in the House Mr. KELLER had often shown his readiness to serve the radical labor leaders that had elected him. At all times he had stood against the administration—for socialism, for Government ownership of railroads, Government price fixing, and Government ownership of public utilities, and many other socialistic ideas.

On November 13, 1919, in a speech in the House of Representatives, he said:

It will be our bounden duty, as representatives of the people, to purchase the railroads and operate them in the public interest. I am ready and willing to assume my share of the responsibility in this matter.

On the 29th day of August, 1919, in the House of Representatives, he further said:

The only remedy for this dangerous condition confronting us is an embargo on exports of all foodstuffs except our surplus and the fixing of prices thereon, as proposed in House Joint Resolution 180, which I introduced a few days ago.

By fixing the prices on the necessities of life the producer will be given his fair return as well as insuring the consumer against excessive prices. It will eventually drive the profiteer out of business. Wages will immediately be stabilized, and the manufacturer will be placed in a position to know where he is at. The result will be a return to normal and a renewal of the confidence of the entire Nation.

The Washington Evening Star of August 8, 1921, quotes Mr. KELLER as follows:

CHARGES WALL STREET CONTROLS GOVERNMENT—REPRESENTATIVE KELLER ATTACKS ADMINISTRATION AND WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

Charging that the machinery of government has been commandeered by a little clique, ignorant of the A B C's of economics, whose blind obedience to Wall Street is responsible for the stupid, selfish, short-sighted policy that is retarding our prosperity and creating profound distrust and discontent among the people, Representative KELLER, of Minnesota, independent Republican, delivered an attack upon the administration generally and on the House Ways and Means Committee particularly for its handling of tax and tariff problems in a statement issued last night.

Declaring that most Members of the House want to carry out the people's wishes with regard to taxation and other economic questions, Mr. KELLER says a "little dominant minority has tied down the safety valve of free discussion until an explosion impends which will scatter the Republican Party from Maine to California."

"The President has assumed more power than any of his predecessors," Mr. KELLER continues, "and tells Congress what bills to pass and what not to pass. Bills concocted at secret conferences are introduced without being referred to responsible committees."

On the 11th day of September last, while the Attorney General was presenting to the court at Chicago evidence of 50,000 crimes committed by the striking shopmen and their sympathizers for the purpose of obstructing transportation, injuring locomotives and rolling stock, and criminal assaults upon non-union workers who had taken the place of the strikers, Mr. KELLER startled the Nation by rising in the House of Representatives and saying:

Mr. Speaker, I impeach Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman rises to a question of this high privilege he ought to present definite charges at the outset.

Mr. KELLER. The Chair means such charges as acts of the Attorney General?

The SPEAKER. Yes; definite charges.

Mr. KELLER. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will do so.

First. Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has used his high office to violate the Constitution of the United States in the following particulars:

- (1) By abridging freedom of speech.
- (2) By abridging the freedom of the press.
- (3) By abridging the right of people peaceably to assemble.

Second. That, unmindful of the duties of his office and his oath to defend the Constitution of the United States, and unmindful of his obligations to discharge those duties faithfully and impartially, the said Harry M. Daugherty has, in his capacity of Attorney General of the United States, conducted himself in a manner arbitrary, oppressive, unjust, and illegal.

Third. He has, without warrant, threatened with punishment citizens of the United States who have opposed his attempts to override the Constitution and the laws of this Nation.

Fourth. He has used the funds of his office illegally and without warrant in the prosecution of individuals and organizations for certain lawful acts which, under the law, he was specifically forbidden to prosecute.

Fifth. He has failed to prosecute individuals and organizations violating the law after those violations have become public scandal.

Sixth. He has defeated the ends of justice by recommending the release from prison of wealthy offenders against the Sherman Anti-trust Act.

Seventh. He has failed to prosecute defendants legally indicted for crimes against the people.

I offer therefore the following resolution and am prepared to appear before a committee of the House, there to produce evidence and witnesses in proof of my charges.

Mr. Speaker, I offer this resolution and I would like to have the Clerk read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 425.

Whereas impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been made on the floor of the House by the Representative from the fourth district of Minnesota: Be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the said Harry M. Daugherty has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oaths to witnesses.

The resolution went at once to the Judiciary Committee and the sensational newspapers of the country gave the charges and Mr. KELLER the necessary large headlines, and many of them accepted the charges as true.

On September 16, five days after these charges had been made, the Judiciary Committee of the House met to hear any evidence that Mr. KELLER might present in support of his charges. He appeared and at once offered the following gratuitous insult to one of the great committees of the House:

I desire at the outset to congratulate the Committee on the Judiciary for its prompt action upon my resolution impeaching Attorney General Daugherty. The committee has thus proved the falsity of the inspired news dispatches which stated that it was the purpose to bury the resolution without action and without hearings.

It was no doubt his intention to so abuse the court before whom he appeared that they would refuse to hear him and he might thereby say to the country that the committee were so prejudiced that they would not hear his evidence, and so forth, and were afraid to give him an opportunity for fear that he might prove the charges he had made against the Attorney General. The committee, however, knowing the prosecutor, refused to be used by Mr. KELLER to get him out of the dilemma into which he had found himself when he was called upon to produce his evidence.

When the committee passed over his insult and asked him to produce his evidence he answered:

The committee should take the charges that I make, and they are true until they are proven not true.

Mr. YATES. Is it your contention that this committee ought now to report this resolution favorably without any showing whatever by you?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have made my charges, and they are true until they are proven not true.

It took some time for the committee to convince Mr. KELLER that the Attorney General was presumed to be innocent until proven to be guilty, and that the burden and duty of proving the charges against him was upon him who made the charges. It was finally agreed, however, that as Congress was about to adjourn to the regular session in December the committee would meet on the first day of that session, December 4, and hear the evidence to be presented by Mr. KELLER, and that December 1 Mr. KELLER should file with the committee specifications of his charges. Then the following proceedings occurred in the committee. I read from the record, on page 13:

Mr. DYER. Has the gentleman consulted an attorney in regard to this matter?

Mr. KELLER. I should want counsel.

Mr. DYER. Who was the gentleman who just spoke to you?

Mr. KELLER. I do not know.

Mr. MCGRADY. I am Mr. McGrady, representing the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. DYER. I wanted to know who you were.

Mr. MCGRADY. I would like to finish my statement. The American Federation of Labor has asked to be heard on this case. President Gompers, with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, is at Atlantic City to-day but will be here next week. We have already made a request to be heard.

Mr. KELLER. Somebody asked me what would be a reasonable time, and I said Thursday would be a reasonable time for furnishing what the committee wants.

Mr. MICHENER. You have stated several times here to-day that you have proof, but that you do not want to divulge it to-day. It strikes me that in an important matter of this kind, in which the entire Nation is interested, and in which one of the chief executives of the Nation is interested, if you have this proof prepared and simply do not want to divulge it because it might prejudice your case you could possibly by working on Sunday come in here Monday and give this committee, not all of your proof, but enough to make a case on which we could conscientiously go to Congress one way or the other. It strikes me that that would be no more than fair.

After the adjournment of these proceedings to December 4, Mr. KELLER rushed at once into the columns of the sensational newspapers with the same and additional charges against the Attorney General and boasted of what he would do and prove if he only had the opportunity before the committee. He secured the consent of the House to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and on September 27, 1922, page 13153 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he again, at great length, went over the charges against Mr. Daugherty and added new ones and was very bitter in his denunciation of the Attorney General.

In the October issue of the Locomotive Engineers' Journal, an organ of the striking shopmen, he contributed an article signed by him and entitled, "Why Daugherty should be impeached," in which he still further added material for the sensational press and new charges against the Attorney General.

Not content with his proceedings before the Judiciary Committee, and not willing to wait a hearing on his charges, he sought every opportunity to make new and reckless charges against the Attorney General, with all disregard of the rights of a high Cabinet officer and a deliberate attempt to prejudice the Attorney General in the eyes of the American people. As a sample of his reckless and unfounded statements, in the article in the Locomotive Engineers' Journal, above mentioned, he said:

The Attorney General of the United States has been guilty both of the abuse of power and the usurpation of power. On the one hand, he has used his office to oppress citizens of one class, to deny them their constitutional rights, to threaten unlawfully to punish them for crimes they have not committed, and to enjoin them unlawfully from doing that which by the laws and Constitution of the United States they are entitled to do.

On the other hand, he has unlawfully granted to another class judicial privileges and favors, has neglected and failed to prosecute them for their criminality, and has released from prison wealthy malefactors convicted of crimes against the American people.

The Attorney General again has repeatedly violated his oath of office by refusing to prosecute malefactors of great wealth. And in certain cases where he was forced to act against wealthy criminals and indictments were found, he has halted their prosecution on false grounds, in an attempt to rescue them from the law.

Radical labor, that had elected Mr. KELLER, now appeared in the person of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and in the official organ of the federation for October, 1922, Gompers, under the heading "Attorney General impeached," said:

House Resolution 425, by Representative KELLER, of Minnesota, directed the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the official conduct of Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty and to report whether he has been guilty of any acts which the Constitution declares are high crimes or misdemeanors. The resolution was the result of the injunction applied for by the Attorney General and granted by Judge Wilkinson against the railroad shopmen. We have heard much from the Attorney General about workers interfering with the mails, but the fact is it is the railroads which have interfered by stopping mail trains altogether. Let the railroads first see what can be done about keeping workers on terms to which workers can agree.

It is the purpose of the American Federation of Labor to do everything possible to bring the impeachment proceedings to a successful conclusion. Labor will participate in the proceedings through its representatives, through its council, and through the presentation of testimony of witnesses.

On December 4 the committee met and called upon Mr. KELLER to proceed with his evidence. He claimed he was not ready and would not proceed until the committee obtained from the House power to subpoena such witnesses as he desired, and until that power was given the committee he would not name the witnesses nor would he proceed. The record of the hearings, page 107, shows the following proceedings when Mr. KELLER introduced his attorney:

Mr. MICHENER. Let us have your name.

Mr. RALSTON. Jackson H. Ralston.

Mr. MICHENER. You are a resident—

Mr. RALSTON (interposing). Of Washington.

Mr. MICHENER. What is your business?

Mr. RALSTON. I am supposed to be an attorney.

Mr. MICHENER. Whom do you represent?

Mr. RALSTON. In this particular I am appearing at the request of Mr. KELLER.

Mr. MICHENER. You are the attorney for the American Federation of Labor also?

Mr. RALSTON. I am.

Mr. MICHENER. And of Mr. Gompers, personally?

Mr. RALSTON. Yes, sir.

That Mr. KELLER might have no excuse for not producing his evidence the committee adjourned to December 12 and on the day of adjournment, December 4, they obtained from the House authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to sit during sessions of the House.

The committee again met on December 12 and again called upon Mr. KELLER to take up the charges in their order. This Mr. KELLER refused to do. All the witnesses called for by Mr. KELLER had been subpoenaed, but Mr. KELLER and his attorney refused to proceed in the order of the charges. He said he would be ready in the morning to proceed with No. 13, and as to the other charges he insultingly said:

I will be ready when I get ready.

The committee was determined that Mr. KELLER should not evade. They were further determined that he should have no excuse to go back to the House or to the country and say that he had no opportunity to present his evidence and the committee therefore agreed with Mr. KELLER and his attorney to hear evidence first on No. 13; this to be followed with No. 4 and then No. 7, and after this the balance of the charges should be taken up in their order.

The next day the committee proceeded to hear the evidence upon charges 13, 4, and 7, and the first trouble came on the part of Mr. KELLER and his attorney in an attempt to offer to the committee evidence that had nothing to do with the charges, but which was intended to prejudice Mr. Daugherty, evidence that could not be admissible in any court of law. On the objection of the committee to hear such improper evidence, Mr. KELLER and his attorney refused to proceed unless they could put in everything they desired. The committee thereupon opened the door and stated, with the consent of the Attorney General, that Mr. KELLER and his attorney should be given the privilege of putting in any kind of evidence that they desired, which was done. At the conclusion of the evidence upon these three specifications it was obvious to everyone that nothing had been proved, that the evidence offered by Mr. KELLER and his attorney was simply for the purpose of prejudice and not for the purpose of proof and that KELLER had no evidence whatever to sustain his charges and only sought to escape from his responsibility.

Mr. KELLER had frequently stated that one of his attorneys was Samuel Untermyer, of New York. This attorney wrote him about this time a letter, from which I will quote, it being an answer to one from KELLER that he (Untermyer) should attend the proceedings before the committee and assist him. Attorney Untermyer said, among other things:

I refused to do so and advised your friends who consulted me to urge your immediate withdrawal from the proceedings.

Thereupon Mr. KELLER arose and stated to the committee that he wanted to make a statement, which he had reduced to writing. It was handed up to the chairman, and on an inspection of the same it disclosed most abusive language directed against the committee that would be unfit for publication, and the committee thereupon ruled that such statements were not in order and asked him to proceed with his evidence in support of the other charges. This Mr. KELLER refused to do, and he and his attorney, Mr. Ralston, withdrew from the room.

The committee were still further determined that Mr. KELLER should not escape his responsibility; and, on his refusal to proceed or to testify as to what evidence he had in his possession, if any, to support his charges and why he had made them, the committee obtained from the Speaker of the House a subpoena which was served upon Mr. KELLER to appear the next morning as a witness. This was duly served; but Mr. KELLER appeared only by his attorney, who stated that he had advised Mr. KELLER not to appear, and took the ground that the committee itself could not arrest Mr. KELLER and force him to testify, as he, Mr. KELLER, was a Member of Congress and was protected under the Constitution.

The committee were satisfied that they had no power to arrest Mr. KELLER and force him to testify, but that their duty was to report the fact to the House under the resolution and the House could proceed to deal with Mr. KELLER as the rules provided. The committee also voted unanimously to proceed to hear anyone in support of the charges, but no one appeared.

Certain criticisms of the Attorney General's office had been made in the House of Representatives by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] and also by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. The committee called these two Members before them, and they testified at some length in regard to any knowledge that they had in the matter, as to the truthfulness of these charges. Both Members were very frank to the committee, and concealed nothing, and claimed to know nothing in the way of evidence that would sustain any of these charges.

Mr. WOODRUFF said in part:

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to state now that I had nothing whatever to do with the preferment of these charges of impeachment. I knew nothing about it until after it had been done; I had nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the bill of particulars; I did not see that bill of particulars until after it had been submitted to the public; I assume no responsibility whatever for anything that may appear in that bill of particulars. As regards the specifications 1 to 13 I know practically nothing and can give very little, if any, assistance on these specifications.

Mr. JOHNSON, in his testimony, said:

It should be said in the beginning that at no time have I ever had any connection with these impeachment charges; I did not know that they were to be filed; I never saw them before they were filed; no one ever consulted me concerning them; I knew nothing about them until they were presented to the House.

It should be said that in my opinion these charges are not based either on law or facts. * * * I would say that I not only have no proof on those charges but there are many of them with which I have absolutely no sympathy.

The committee then gave an opportunity to the Attorney General to explain by witnesses, if he so desired, the several charges and specifications filed by Mr. KELLER. The Attorney General, by his assistants and witnesses, went minutely into the charges, covering them all with such convincing testimony as to leave no doubt in the minds of the committee that the charges were without any foundation whatever.

The testimony before the committee is found in the printed hearings, covering 573 pages. I have not time to review all the testimony. Mr. KELLER seemed to rely upon the testimony of two witnesses, to wit, Mr. Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, but who, when called, furnished no proof whatever in support of any of the charges.

The star witness for the prosecution, that had been paraded a great deal by Mr. KELLER and his counsel, Mr. Thomas O. Stevenson, attorney for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, testified at great length before the committee, principally in the matter of the Chicago injunction proceedings, but furnished no evidence at all to support the charges. In the course of his testimony I put to him the following questions and received the following answers in regard to the condition of the rolling stock and the want of inspection of locomotives during the strike:

Mr. HERSEY. And they had not been inspected because of the strike; is that it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I must say that we could not consider the reason why they were not inspected.

Mr. HERSEY. What was the reason that brought about the want of inspection or this use of defective locomotives? Was it not due to the strike?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is rather a large subject, sir; if you wish me to go into it and give some personal opinion, I can do so.

Mr. HERSEY. I am asking for your opinion. If the strike had not come on and there had been no strike, you would not have had any complaint, would you?

Mr. STEVENSON. From the viewpoint of a lot of people, not expressing myself; but the cause of it, the primary cause, was the direct intention of certain railroads to break up certain labor organizations.

Mr. HERSEY. Never mind about that. I am asking your opinion. If there had been no strike and the shopmen had continued at work and had not struck, you would have had no complaints to make to the Attorney General at present, would you?

Mr. STEVENSON. Probably not, sir.

Mr. FOSTER, of the committee, further questioned him, as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. In your judgment, knowing the attitude of the Attorney General, do you think his conduct in this matter has been such that in your judgment the Attorney General should be impeached? Give the committee the benefit of your judgment, as you have been in touch with the situation.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a difficult question to answer.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the committee want your judgment.

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. Stevenson, although prejudiced in favor of his organization and wishing to do all he could to assist the prosecution, was honest enough to admit that he knew nothing in the evidence that was cause for impeachment of the Attorney General.

After exhausting all information, rumors, or charges that came to the committee in any way the committee reported to the House that—

It does not appear that there is any ground to believe that Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor requiring the interposition of the impeachment powers of the House.

In the debate in the House on the acceptance of this report of the committee the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], a member of the committee and a Democrat, said:

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to express my own conviction as a member of the Judiciary Committee that upon the charges investigated there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the charges of impeachment contained in the resolution or as more particularly made in his supplementary resolution or bill of complaint wherein the charges were made in more concrete and precise form.

But I had no doubt, and no one else in the committee had, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the charges of impeachment formulated against the Attorney General, and I voted in the committee that there was no evidence to prove or support the offense charged in the proceedings, and I stand upon that now. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], not a member of the committee, but one who had carefully read the impeachment proceedings, addressed the House, and his remarks, while short, cover so completely the work of the committee that I quote them in full, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House: I have absolutely no patience with the disposition and practice of certain alleged newspapers, certain interests, and certain Members in this and the other legislative Chamber, who make it a daily habit to impugn the motives and sincerity of the President of the United States and criticize and abuse certain branches of his administration. These alleged newspapers and gentlemen have been particularly assiduous and bitter in their attacks upon the Department of Justice, and it is while assaulting the head of this department that their spleen becomes abnormally inflamed and their invectives wax particularly vitriolic and acrimonious. To lambast the Attorney General seems to be their pet diversion, and it occurs to me that many of their attacks are without any foundation in fact whatsoever. I hold no special brief for General Daugherty, and have no commission to defend him. I think he has frequently demonstrated that he is amply able to take care of himself. But, gentlemen of the House, the thing that I deplore—the thing that I desire to condemn and the thing that I consider thoroughly disgusting and demoralizing—is this wholesale, reckless, rampant, and indiscriminate abuse of public officials generally by every Tom, Dick, and Harry in the country whose peculiar ideas are not reflected in the acts of such public official. An honest, just, and conscientious criticism of the acts of public officials is commendable and should be encouraged. But the type of criticism that is usually indulged in encourages lack of confidence in the integrity of government itself and breeds Bolshevism and anarchy. The impeachment proceedings now pending against the present incumbent of the Attorney General's office has afforded these aforesaid newspapers and gentlemen an opportunity to produce anything detrimental to the character, conduct, and integrity of the administration of the Attorney General's office; and the hearings on this resolution disclose that their efforts to discredit Harry M. Daugherty and his official conduct have been a signal, melancholy, and monumental failure.

His accusers now stand discredited in the estimation of the whole country, "and none are so poor as will do them reverence." It does not matter what we may think of Harry M. Daugherty as an individual. I do contend, however, that we ought to have too much respect for the office of Attorney General than to drag it into ridicule and disrepute, or to attempt to poison public opinion against it by willful and malicious misrepresentation.

In conclusion, I desire to repeat that whenever we destroy the confidence of the people in the integrity of government, there is nothing left but Bolshevism and anarchy.

The House accepted the report of the committee and fully exonerated the Attorney General of any and all of the charges made by Mr. KELLER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER], who had made these charges and had withdrawn from the committee, is now in the South for his health. A weekly newspaper published in Washington called Labor, the journal of the original labor organizations, denounced the proceedings as a "whitewash" and in attempting to speak for Mr. KELLER, on December 30, 10 days before the report of the committee had been made, said:

Congressman KELLER has already served notice on the Attorney General that unless the latter gets out of public life the impeachment fight will be renewed as soon as the new Congress convenes, and Daugherty has had enough experience with KELLER to know that the fighting Congressman from Minnesota will make good.

Outside of labor journals the reliable newspapers of the country generally commended the report of the committee and the decision of the House that the charges were wholly unsupported.

The Manufacturer, a leading journal in industry, in its issue of December 26, 1922, said:

INQUISITION, NOT IMPEACHMENT.

Fortunately for the public, the collapse of the impeachment proceedings against the Attorney General has been accompanied by an inside view of the animus behind the charges.

In this respect the whole matter takes on a significance extremely important to good government in the United States. If any pronounced radical in Congress can be permitted, without challenge, to abuse the high privilege of his office and demand impeachment of a Cabinet officer for no other reason than to project himself into the limelight, no Cabinet officer is safe and, broadly speaking, the executive departments at Washington can not function.

The breaking down of these impeachment proceedings should be a salutary lesson for the future. There should be no minimizing the gravity of the issue involved. There was never any real chance, of course, that the charges could be substantiated. But if any Member of Congress has the privilege of attacking a Cabinet officer with charges of such a character, no future Attorney General could administer properly the affairs of this great office. Misconduct in executive office should of course be checked and punished, no matter who is the offender nor what his standing; but to make such officer a target for unfounded attack and vicious propaganda is something totally unfair and absolutely contrary to the spirit of American institutions.

I am pleased to note also that a leading newspaper of my State, the Portland Press Herald, in its issue of January 22, 1923, said editorially:

THE PLOT THAT FAILED.

Attorney General Daugherty has been exonerated by an overwhelming vote of the House Judiciary Committee, a vote in which the Democratic members joined. The attempt to have impeachment proceedings brought against him failed. He is now at liberty to get after the grafters who grew fat while the Nation was struggling to win the war. The proceedings brought against him were inspired by these very interests who are threatened with prosecution by the Government and who will be compelled to disgorge some of the money they secured through rich contracts, if the Attorney General has his way. They brought all manner of charges against Attorney General Daugherty in the hope of embarrassing him and preventing him from going ahead with the suits he has already instituted. The plot failed, and now, let us hope, the grafters will be compelled to face the music.

I might quote other expressions of the public throughout the United States in praise of the Attorney General and his work, but have not the time to do so.

I wish to say in closing that the work of the present Attorney General's office in 1922 is now before us. It is a splendid record of achievement. A few brief facts show something of what he has done. I mention a few:

1. Instituted civil suits against builders of Army camps, and so forth, during the war to recover more than $50,000,000.

2. Secured indictments against those who have conspired against the Government in the purchase and handling of war material to the number of hundreds.

3. Prosecution of violators of the food and drug act and the prohibitory laws. Over $50,000,000 have been imposed in fines during the past year.

4. Instituted over 60,000 new criminal cases during the past year.

5. Vigorous prosecution of antitrust laws and frauds against the Government.

6. Successful prosecution in injunction proceedings against those who would destroy the transportation system of the country and deprive the people of coal and food in their hour of need.

The Attorney General has shown great ability, honesty of purpose, fearlessness of action, and sublime devotion to duty in his great office. The attempts of certain radical organizations and sinister foes of law and order to prejudice and impeach him have given the people a new insight into the fine character and courage of the man who has placed himself high among the great and fearless leaders of law and order, and these proceedings in Congress to impeach him and the hearings thereon have been of great benefit to the people of this Nation, as they have satisfied this country that the law-abiding people have in him a most trustful and efficient public servant who will protect the best interests of the law-abiding people of this country against the radical attempts of revolution, and future history will place Harry M. Daugherty high among the great and notable men of the present age.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to state that I will vote to sustain the adverse report filed by the Judiciary Committee and will vote to pass the resolution recommended by the committee. Unfortunately, I have not been granted sufficient time. The time usually reserved for members of the committee has been partly given to others, and the result is that I have just been advised by the chairman of the committee that I may have two or three minutes. Manifestly no comprehensive or exhaustive statement can be made within that time. I had hoped to be granted 15 minutes at least. I will simply do the best I can under the circumstances.

The charges in this case were substantially as follows:

First, that the Attorney General of the United States had taken more time than was necessary to institute and prosecute certain prosecutions;

Second, that he had been too lenient in recommending certain pardons;

Third, that he had done wrong in discharging certain employees;

Fourth, that he had done wrong in retaining one employee, namely, William J. Burns, Chief of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice;

Fifth, that he had erred in not bringing injunctions to enforce the duties incumbent upon railroads in the matter of inspection of locomotives;

Lastly, that he had appeared in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois and caused to be issued an injunction restraining certain railroad employees from certain acts.

Before the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, it was insisted by the Hon. OSCAR E. KELLER, Member of this House, who filed the charges, that these different acts upon the part of the Attorney General constituted high crimes and misdemeanors, for which he should be impeached.

I do not think that the question of the conduct of Mr. KELLER or his misconduct before the committee have anything to do with this question. I do not agree with that portion of the report which at great length goes into the question of whether Mr. KELLER can be punished because of his actions before that committee culminating in his walking out of the committee room after handing to the chairman an abusive letter. It seems to me that any action by the House in regard to that matter should be a separate and distinct thing. I do not believe in making Mr. KELLER a martyr. He did a most serious, and grave, and solemn thing when he charged the chief law officer of the American Government with being guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors—in other words of being guilty of being a criminal. His conduct is to be strongly disapproved, in my opinion, but it has nothing to do with this case, except as it shows that his action in filing the charges was ill-advised and ill-considered, and without due appreciation of the gravity of the matter.

I heard every word of the testimony in this case. I have known Harry M. Daugherty longer probably than any man in this House. We were students together in the same law school in 1882—40 years ago. Since then I have been near him and with him in several campaigns—1896 and 1900, 1908 and 1912, and 1920, if I remember correctly. In other words, I have knowledge of him. Growing out of that knowledge I have confidence in him. In former years I believed him to be honest and fearless. My confidence is justified.

I did not in those days believe him to be a criminal. Accordingly, I watched every line of the testimony in the present case with more care and anxiety than would ordinarily be the case. I am glad to conclude that the evidence does not show that he has become a criminal or is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors.

There is no time to go into a discussion of the different charges. Some of them seem to me to be exceedingly foolish. For example, it was sought to be shown that Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, who in answer to questions by me admitted that he had suggested and partly prepared this particular charge, had learned something from President Taft, which President Taft had learned from Attorney General Wickersham, which Attorney General Wickersham had learned from Pardon Attorney Finch, which Pardon Attorney Finch had learned from a man whose name I do not now recall, which this latter man had learned from Mr. Burns. In other words, Burns had told something to a man who had told it to Finch who had told it in an opinion to Wickersham who had told it in an opinion to Taft who had expressed it in a pardon, a copy of which he gave to Mr. Gompers—all about a thing that occurred in 1905 in connection with a prosecution in the West 17 years ago.

William J. Burns was accused of certain misconduct in 1905. Burns denied it all, and his honesty and efficiency were testified to by United States Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, of California.

I believe that the most serious charge brought against Mr. Daugherty was the one which charged him with being guilty of malfeasance in office because he appeared in the United States court in Chicago and obtained a certain writ of injunction. There had been a great strike, and there had been some rioting. Three courses were open to the Government:

First, it could allow murder and train wrecking and other violence to continue;

Second, it could call out the armed forces of the Nation and with rifle fire mow down everybody, including bystanders; or Third, it could resort to the orderly processes of the law, namely, the writ of injunction.

The highest and finest and kindest thing the Attorney General could have done was to resort to this writ. He did so, and the murder and train wrecking ceased.

I believe it was because the Attorney General did this thing that this prosecution was brought. If he had allowed the murder and train wrecking to continue, he would not be here threatened with impeachment. If the Government had mowed down everybody, this impeachment prosecution would not have been suggested. It was because he dared to do his duty that this thing is here to-day. I am absolutely satisfied that behind this procedure—although it may be to-day directly or indirectly conscientiously approved by Members of this House—I am absolutely satisfied that the purpose of this proceeding was to defy and intimidate the Attorney General of the United States and all future Attorneys General and all future officers of the law; the purpose was to serve notice upon this Attorney General and all coming officers that they must not resort to the orderly processes of the law. On the very day that the Attorney General was standing in his place in court in Illinois, on the 11th day of September, 1922, begging and appealing to the court to issue the writ which would restore law and order this proceeding was instituted before this House. I believe that the time has not yet come in America when an honest and fearless official will be impeached on such a record as has been made in this case, and therefore I vote to acquit him and not impeach him.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House: I have absolutely no patience with the disposition and practice of certain alleged newspapers, certain interests, and certain Members in this and the other legislative Chamber, who make it a daily habit to impugn the motives and sincerity of the President of the United States and criticize and abuse certain branches of his administration. In conclusion, I desire to repeat that whenever we destroy the confidence of the people in the integrity of government, there is nothing left but Bolshevism and anarchy.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to make only one or two observations. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] made the statement that we had refused to send for documents and witnesses where there was opportunity to get them. If the gentleman had been more attentive on the meetings of the committee, he might have discovered that a good many of the things he complains of appear in the RECORD or are on file in the committee. Take, for instance, the Hayden letter. I asked the War Department to furnish it, and it is in the committee. The investigation had in the Department of Justice in regard to the United Gas Improvement Co. is likewise available. The complaint that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] makes because we did not investigate Mr. Johnson's charges is far-fetched, as that related to the War Department. We had no authority to investigate that matter. The Omand letter and telegram came in after the hearings were completed. Mr. Graham has dealt with that. The Greenburg matter was brought to our attention and investigated. A very thorough investigation of that particular matter was had.

This discussion has not brought to light any fact that would justify impeachment. I am not aware that anyone has made the claim that the record shows any such evidence. No one has pointed to a single charge and said to the House that this charge has been established or that he knows or has reason to believe that there are any witnesses that can sustain such charge. Without something of that kind there is no reason for further investigation. It is not just to keep a man under a criminal charge without cause. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], who asks for further investigation, made no such demand when the committee unanimously voted to close the hearings. He ought to have spoken then. It was not fair to remain silent when it was his duty to speak.

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, some months ago a resolution was introduced by a Member of this House in which he deliberately charged a prominent official of this Government with malfeasance and misconduct in office, and thereupon asked that this official be removed by the solemn judgment of a court of impeachment. Let it be understood that I am not here as the spokesman of the Attorney General, nor am I here to interpose a defense for the distinguished members of the Committee on the Judiciary before whom the hearings upon this matter have been conducted. They need no defense at my hands. I am here in my own right as a Member of the House of Representatives, unabashed and unafraid to proclaim to the world that this the greatest deliberative legislative body on earth has not degenerated to the point of impotency. I would like to believe that that flag as she unfurls herself to the placid breezes of the newborn day carries not only inspiration and hope but liberty and life, freedom and justice to every citizen beneath its folds, and that in return it exacts, demands, yea, commands, undying loyalty to the Constitution and to the laws enacted pursuant thereto. I believe in liberty under the law. I believe in law. I believe in giving to every man justice and a "square deal," but I do not believe that I or any other Member of this House has the unqualified right to assassinate the character of any citizen upon the flimsiest pretext and then shield ourselves behind the oft-times dirty cloak of "privileged communication."

Do not understand me, sirs, to say that I criticize a man for bringing to the attention of this body matters concerning the conduct of a public official, but upon the contrary, let it be understood that I believe when facts are brought to the attention of a Member of this body from which it is evident, or from which it may be reasonably and honestly inferred that some public official has been or is guilty of corrupt practices, that it is not only the privilege, but the imperative duty of him to take appropriate action. If he does so in good faith he deserves the commendation of every patriotic American, but, if after the step has been taken that besmirches the character, he then seals his lips and defies the authority to question his motive, his actions are indefensible and deserve the condemnation of every citizen of this Republic. I can not believe that it was ever intended that a man, no matter what his station in life may be, no matter whether he be great or small, rich or poor, black or white, in office or out of office, should have the right to besmirch character for self-aggrandizement, or out of a spirit of pure malevolence. This body, in my judgment, has plenary power to go to the root of this matter, and I, for one, shall demand a full investigation into the sources of information upon which the charges were based.

To do this is but to do simple justice toward a faithful public official; to do less is to acknowledge our helplessness and invite a condition the ultimate ends of which may be fraught with the gravest eventualities.

Propaganda has and is now being circulated to the effect that the Judiciary Committee, its chairman, and its several members were prejudiced in favor of the Attorney General and had sought to prevent a full and fair investigation. I am not a member of that committee, but I was present and heard all the testimony offered. I do not believe there is a lawyer in Christendom who has heard, or who will read, the hearings in this case but that will say that the committee at all times admitted testimony against General Daugherty which had no relevancy to the case, and in many instances admitted testimony which was clearly inadmissible because mere hearsay. I attended these hearings because I was anxious to observe the manner and demeanor of the witnesses who testified. I went there with a mind free from bias or prejudice. I had formed no opinion the one way or the other, but when I observed the demeanor and conduct of those in charge of the prosecution I was at once convinced that they were but looking for an opportune time to abandon the hearings under some flimsy pretext. I so expressed my views to a number of my colleagues, and now I am convinced beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the purported prosecution was but a persecution, and this body and this people has the right and should know the whole truth concerning the reasons prompting such action.

There is a tiger in the den and the future peace of this Republic demands firm and courageous action now.

Listen to this editorial from the Washington Times. Clear, concise, and logical. Let us follow the suggestion here made and demonstrate to the world that the integrity of this body or an official of this Government can not be assailed with absolute impunity.

It reads:

What is all this attack on Attorney General Daugherty about? Anybody who has had experience with persecutions of this kind knows they are not due to failure to be aggressive in performance of duty, but are always due to powerful enemies that have been offended by a just and impartial performance of duty.

The plain question in Attorney General Daugherty's case is, therefore, not what has Attorney General Daugherty failed to do, but in what vigorous way has he enforced the law, which has caused some big interest to hate him and to go out to "get him," and to stir up its big hired lawyers and its little owned politicians to attack the man who has offended this interest and to say things that will be printed in newspapers even though they are never proved nor even attempted to be proved.

The investigation of Attorney General Daugherty has fallen utterly flat.

No proof of any allegation has been presented. The chief accuser, and on the flimsiest of pretexts, has even refused to testify; and the evidence which has been heard from the most honorable and independent men like Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, has all been in defense of Attorney General Daugherty, and in support of Attorney General Daugherty and in commendation of his acts and his activities.

What is needed now is another investigation, to find out who the big interests are who are attacking the Attorney General of the United States, and who are trying to discredit him and weaken him and weaken the force of his official procedure.

Is it the whisky ring, against which the Attorney General's office has been especially active?

Is it the war profiteers, who were so powerful with the late Democratic administration?

Is it the Palmer-Garvan outfit, who fraudulently confiscated alien property and delivered it to their friends and whom the Attorney General has exposed?

Most surely there is some big interest and some corrupt interest responsible for the attacks upon the Attorney General of the United States, which attacks up to this time have been so utterly baseless and futile as to make them an insult to the American people whom the Attorney General represents.

Let us make an investigation and make it so thorough that no official of this Government in the years to come shall fear to do his whole duty as God has given him the power to discern the right.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the resolution which I send to the Speaker's desk to have read, and on that resolution I move the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, let us have the resolution reported first.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize all gentlemen in due time. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 495.

That whereas the Committee on the Judiciary has made an examination touching the charges sought to be investigated under H. Res. 425 to ascertain if there is any probable ground to believe that any of the charges are true; and on consideration of the charges and the evidence obtained it does not appear that there is any ground to believe that Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor requiring the interposition of the impeachment powers of the House: Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the charges and proposed impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and that H. Res. 425 be laid upon the table.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should like to inquire if the resolution just reported is the resolution on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this Resolution No. 425, which the gentleman from Minnesota moves to lay on the table, is the one that is on the calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I inquire how it happens to be on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] was acting as Speaker pro tempore at that time. The rule, of course, is that an adverse report will lie on the table unless within three days, I believe, some Member asks that it be put upon the calendar. The Chair understands that when it was reported the chairman of the committee asked that it should go upon the calendar and thereupon the Speaker pro tempore placed it on the calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the chairman of the committee make that request in the House or privately?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the resolution offered by the gentleman now be laid upon the table, then that will be the end of the entire matter, would it not, unless a de novo proceeding is instituted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution upon the table. That is a privileged motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It has not been ordered.

Mr. MONDELL. It has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to qualify his statement that it would dispose of the whole matter. It would be a question in the Chair's mind whether the charges of impeachment, which the gentleman from Minnesota made, would follow the resolution to the table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary has killed that, and frankly I want to say I am taking the simplest way out of this proposition. There is no way to impeach the Attorney General unless the Committee on the Judiciary brings a resolution of impeachment before us. To lay this matter upon the table, and it is a privileged motion, there is only one higher motion, and that is to adjourn, ends this whole controversy. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. That motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman means Resolution 425?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The resolution which the gentleman has offered and that carries everything else with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to mean this resolution which the Clerk has just reported.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That will carry all the rest with it—

The SPEAKER. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Including Resolution 425.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question of recognition for a motion to lay on the table rests with the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Tennessee addressed the Chair on a parliamentary inquiry immediately following the demand of the gentleman from Minnesota to move the previous question. Is it not within the province of the Speaker to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota to move the previous question on the resolution just submitted to the desk?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. Anybody who wishes to move to lay upon the table has always the prior right of recognition over a person moving the previous question. But the Chair misunderstood the gentleman from Tennessee, and possibly in answering the parliamentary inquiry has misled him. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Tennessee, in asking whether a motion to lay on the table would not end the whole matter, referred to Resolution 425. The Chair now understands the gentleman to refer to this last resolution, and that he moves to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I move to lay Resolution 425 on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. That will leave the matter where it is.

Mr. BEGG. That does not end it. If the House decided to lay it on the table, can not it be taken from the table within any reasonable time? In other words, is the gentleman correct when he says that it ends this whole thing? It does not do anything of the kind.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it is laid on the table, will the gentleman from Ohio move to take it from the table within a reasonable time?

Mr. BEGG. There might be somebody similar to the man who made the original charges who would make such a motion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the House would sustain it? If the gentleman wants to end it let him—

Mr. MONDELL. The motion would undoubtedly dispose of the resolution now offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, but it would leave the resolution of impeachment and the report made upon it exactly where it was when we began the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And end it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the contrary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should think, Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on the Judiciary made an adverse report except by a blunder it would never have been put on the Calendar and ought not to be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Chair, when he answered the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, asking whether laying the resolution upon the table would end the matter, supposed the gentleman was referring to House Resolution 425, the resolution which originally referred this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, and not the resolution of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], which is now pending. Is that what the gentleman intended? The Chair now understands the gentleman meant to move that this resolution which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] offered, and which lays the whole subject on the table, to lay this on the table. Which does the gentleman mean?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think that either would carry this whole proposition and end this matter. I move to lay upon the table the resolution which the Speaker holds in his hand and the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Tennessee offers that on the theory that if his motion carried, the resolution providing for an impeachment inquiry and the report of the committee made thereon would lie on the table. That is not correct. As a matter of fact they would remain as they are. The only effect his motion would have would be to end the resolution now offered by the gentleman from Minnesota—

Mr. LONGWORTH. And leave alive House Resolution 425.
Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and leave the question we have been debating as it now is.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair call the attention of the House to just what it is that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] now moves to lay on the table. The resolution is—

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the charges of impeachment against Henry M. Daugherty, the Attorney General, and that the House resolution be laid on the table.

Now a motion to lay that on the table, in the opinion of the Chair, if carried leaves the matter just exactly where it is now. At first blush it refuses—

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, can I cite a case in point?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. If the Chair will look at section 768 of the rules he will find this citation, and I know from past experience that these citations are accurate. I read:

When a bill is laid on the table, pending motions connected therewith go to the table also (V. 5426, 5427); and when a proposed amendment is laid on the table the pending bill goes there also (V. 5423).

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that under those rulings, if this resolution is laid on the table—and the Speaker knows the table in this connection is the final sepulcher in the House; that is the place where you refer a resolution or bill to kill it finally—it seems to me that under these precedents cited if this resolution is laid on the table, all resolutions and all matters in any way connected with the resolution would also go to the table and the whole matter be ended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's first-blush opinion is this, that this is not a resolution such as is referred to in the citation quoted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], nor is it an amendment. This is a resolution disposing of the whole matter. This is a resolution laying the whole subject on the table. It seems to the Chair at first blush that a motion to lay that on the table, if it carried, would be equivalent to rejecting it. It would be rejecting a motion to lay the impeachment proceedings on the table, and it seems to the Chair that it would still leave the impeachment matter pending.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman's motion is a motion to lay on the table a motion to lay a resolution on the table, and that being so, could not some one move to lay his motion on the table, and go on in that way ad infinitum? I submit that that would be the situation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the point of order has already been made that this motion is not in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair will be glad to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, there are two ways to reach an adverse vote on a resolution. One is to vote it down; the other is to table it. This resolution is to discharge the committee. One way to do it would be to vote it down. The other way would be to table it. If you table it, you have not discharged the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is in the line suggested by my colleague. Would not the effect of tabling this resolution be exactly the same as voting it down, which would leave House Resolution 425 in precisely the same position as it is in now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it is voted down, there will be made a motion to table House Resolution 425. If we can get rid of this thing, let us do it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my contention is that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. You can not move that a motion to table be tabled.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is really a motion to lay House Resolution 425 on the table. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota on the table, which is clearly not in order. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, embodied in the motion he sent to the Clerk's desk and had read, disposes of the resolution placed upon the calendar at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary a few days ago.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman from Minnesota be willing to strike out the first part of his resolution and let us come directly to a vote on the last part of his resolution? If so, the matter can be settled in a minute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think not.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a resolution on the calendar awaiting action. We have attempted to dispose of it in a certain way and have here a resolution to accomplish the purpose. Among other things, this resolution contains a motion to lay on the table the other resolution now on the calendar. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] moves to lay this resolution on the table.

It is clear that such a motion is in order; but if the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee should prevail it would defeat the method that has been chosen of disposing of the resolution which is on the calendar and would leave the resolution on the calendar just where it is now. If we do this we shall have marched up the hill and then marched down again without accomplishing anything. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the statement just made by the gentleman from Connecticut, which is substantially what the Chair said a few moments ago. If the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] were simply a motion to lay upon the table, then the Chair thinks it would not be in order for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to move to lay it on the table; but the Chair thinks that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is much more than that, that it is an independent resolution which disposes of the whole subject and which couples with the motion to lay on the table other factors. Therefore the Chair believes the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is in order, although to adopt it would be simply to refuse to dispose of the subject and would leave it exactly where it is now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It will be followed by another motion, if the Chair please.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if he wishes to make the motion, for it is a preferential motion on which the leader of the minority is entitled to recognition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I desire to get at it in a parliamentary way.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the Chair overrule my motion?

The SPEAKER. No. Does the gentleman wish to make a motion?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I move to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to lay the motion on the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 204, answered "present" 2, not voting 134, as follows:

Mr. Sanders of New York with Mr. Sabath.

Mr. Vestal with Mr. Sears.

Mr. Scott of Michigan with Mr. Stoll.

Mr. Zihlman with Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Reed of West Virginia with Mr. Wright.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. I do not happen to know how he would vote on this particular question, but in order to protect him I desire to change my vote from "no" to "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Minnesota has moved the previous question. The gentleman can offer his amendment if the previous question is not adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. But I notified the Chair that I was going to offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman well knows that as a matter of duty and precedents the Chair recognizes the gentleman in charge of the bill. It is in the hands of the House as to whether they wish to consider the amendment or not. If the House votes down the previous question, it shows that it desires to consider the amendment. If it votes for the previous question, it shows that it does not wish to consider the amendment. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what division he asks for?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The first paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to a division, and the Clerk will read the first paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whereas the Committee on the Judiciary has made an examination touching the charges sought to be investigated under House Resolution 425 to ascertain if there is any probable ground to believe that any of the charges are true; and on consideration of the charges and the evidence obtained it does not appear that there is any ground to believe that Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor requiring the interposition of the impeachment powers of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a proper division. The Clerk has not reached the resolution. He is attempting to divide the whereases from the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to that division.

Mr. MONDELL. But he is not dividing the resolution; he is dividing the preamble from the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May we have the resolution read?

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the charges and proposed impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and that House Resolution 425 be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I make the point of order that that comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been agreed to and the Clerk will read the preamble. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 206, nays 78, answered "present" 3, not voting 141, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1923.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1923.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1923.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, a Senator from the State of Washington, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. JONES of Washington thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT DOCUMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing the number of documents received and distributed by the Treasury Department during the year ended December 31, 1922, together with the number remaining on hand January 1, 1923, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in partial response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, relative to the ownership and upkeep of passenger automobiles in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, Bureau of Mines, St. Elizabeths Hospital, and Freedmen's Hospital, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the academy for the year 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

USE OF AUTOMOBILES BY DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, the report which came in to-day from the District Commissioners relative to automobiles. I desire to note in the RECORD the fact that the report was sent to the Senate after the District appropriation bill was passed, just as I predicted yesterday and the day before would be done.

I want to add that the total annual cost of upkeep and maintenance for automobiles in the city, according to a hasty calculation I have made from the figures, is the enormous sum of $216,879.50. I also find that there are 17 private policemen listed, each drawing a stipend of $40 a month additional for upkeep of private automobiles in which to ride. I want to suggest that perhaps that is the reason we have so many accidents.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table a communication received from the American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil. There being no objection, the communication was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FOR BRAZIL,

Rio de Janeiro, December 22, 1922.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
United States Senator for Indiana.

SIR: The ship subsidy bill now before the Senate is of vital importance to all Americans living abroad and engaged in the development of our foreign trade.

The American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil, a body whose membership includes all American firms and individuals interested in the commerce between the United States and Brazil, earnestly solicits your vote for, and support of, the ship subsidy bill. The enactment of this bill into law, without changing its basic principles or hampering the American merchant marine by rules prejudicing its efficiency in competition with foreign lines, means the permanent establishment and continuance of our merchant marine, while, on the other hand, the defeat of this measure or amending it to an extent that would change its fundamental object, or imposing impossible restrictions, would stop the further development of our merchant marine, seriously affect our prestige abroad, hurt and retard the development of our foreign trade.

We Americans abroad, representatives of American manufacturers and commercial enterprises, are away from our native land for the serious purpose of furthering our foreign trade and marketing our home products. We believe that the future greatness of our country depends upon the development of a trade which will supply foreigners with American products, gives employment to many of our fellow countrymen, and enriches the national patrimony. Experience has shown us that the development of our foreign trade is dependent upon three fundamental principles, which are American ships, American cables, and American banking institutions; of these American shipping holds the leading position. We have always to face strong competition by commercial rivals strongly entrenched in the field, and, if we must pay toll to them in the way of ocean freight, suffer delays of and damage to our goods, we are simply defeating our object and nullifying our efforts.

The assurance of the continuation of our merchant marine is of primary importance to us; we believe that the measure under discussion will assure this result. The measure is constructive, financially sound, and based upon business principles: A measure which will stimulate private capital to buy and operate the present Government-owned ships, thereby strengthening the present existing lines, and perhaps bringing new lines into operation; reduce the burden borne by the American people; and salvage a considerable portion of our $3,000,000,000 investment in ships, is one we hope every Senator will support and, if necessary, temporarily set aside party lines for the general welfare of his fellow citizens.

The American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil has observed the expansion of opportunities for American business and increased prestige since the establishment of the American steamship lines to the east coast of South America. Many of our ships compare more than favorably with those of our competitive European countries. Our business has been benefited by better schedules of arrivals and sailings to the United States, which has opened up a field for trade in perishable goods which previously was impossible.

We believe in governmental aid being freely given to American steamship lines to all parts of the world where American products are marketed until these lines are firmly established.

We oppose governmental ownership and operation of public carriers—that is, steamship and railroad lines—as all our important public utilities have been successfully developed only through private initiative and energy. We also oppose the present method of joint operation by Government and private companies, as it is inefficient and expensive; responsibility can not be successfully divided.

Our competitors have built up large fleets through government support; our own Government has helped develop our great industries by protective tariffs; aid to our shipping interests should not be withheld, especially as they are of such vital importance to our foreign trade and the American people have such a large investment in the ships; aid through the tariff can not be given, but it can be given in some other form.

An analysis and a comparison of present conditions and the relief the ship subsidy bill offers should convince any reasoning man of the benefits to be gained by passing such legislation and win his support for the bill. At present the American people are paying an annual subsidy of over $50,000,000 to maintain the shipping interests of the Government; this does not provide for new construction or replacement, hence does not guarantee our merchant marine beyond the period that the ships will be serviceable; in addition to this outlay of funds the American people are suffering an annual loss, probably much greater, in the way of deterioration and wearing out of the ships, and it will only be a question of years until this huge investment becomes a total loss.

A continuation of present methods is not only obstructive but is destructive, while by enacting the measure under discussion into law the future of our merchant marine will be assured, a considerable salvage of the $3,000,000,000 investment will occur, and the annual subsidy will be reduced by one-half.

Your fellow citizens residing here—and many are from your State—strongly urge you to support the ship subsidy bill.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, composed of over 1,300 commercial bodies, with a membership aggregating 300,000, by referendum vote is overwhelmingly in favor of this bill. The House of Representatives has passed the measure, and the President is its strong advocate. The American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil feels so strongly in this matter that it intends to give its views the widest publicity and use the full force of its influence toward the support of this measure.

Should this measure fail to pass the Senate our chamber here will feel that those responsible for its failure will have shown a lack of patriotism, foresight, and astounding ignorance of the urgent needs of American foreign trade.

Respectfully yours,

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FOR BRAZIL,
WM. J. STEVENS, President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution of the Woman's Club of Rock Springs, Wyo., favoring an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENDRICK presented resolutions of the Gate City National Farm Loan Association, of Pine Bluffs, and the Laramie County Farmers' Union, both in the State of Wyoming, opposing amendment of the Federal farm loan act in any manner which would affect the cooperative functions of the national farm loan associations, and urging that the Federal land banks be turned over to the farmers to be managed by farmer borrower-directors, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a communication in the nature of a memorial from the Texarkana Freight Bureau, of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., remonstrating against the adoption of the Ripley plan for consolidation of the railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NELSON presented 30 petitions, numerous signed by sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LADD presented a petition of 53 citizens of Oakes, Crete, Stirum, and Hampler, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the accompanying letter, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

EIGHTEENTH LEGISLATIVE SESSION,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, January 23, 1923.

Senator E. F. LADD,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am authorized by the Senate of the State of North Dakota to forward you a copy of the Kretschmar concurrent resolution concerning the Great Lakes waterway project, which has been adopted by both houses of the North Dakota Legislature.

You will find a copy inclosed.

Very truly yours,

W. E. PARSONS,
Secretary of Senate.

Senate concurrent resolution introduced by Mr. Kretschmar.
GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY PROJECT.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas the great and natural resources of the State of North Dakota are as yet undeveloped and said State is dependent upon agriculture for its prosperity, and agriculture being the fundamental basis for prosperity in all Northwest States; and

Whereas in a large measure, if not entirely, the price of agricultural products is dependent upon foreign markets; and

Whereas the present rates for transportation of such products are too high to be in just proportion to the price received therefor at terminal markets, and thus has a tendency to curtail the production of the staple articles of agriculture needed by all people in all lands; and

Whereas the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project, if completed and perfected, will furnish to the people of the State of North Dakota a cheaper method of transportation of their products to foreign markets, thus assuring them a higher revenue for the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein): That we do hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States, and respectfully urge that Congress take immediate action toward the passage of such laws or law which will make possible the early completion and perfection of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project; be it further

Resolved. That the secretary of the Senate send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and of the Montana and Minnesota Legislatures, respectively, also to our Members in Congress.

Approved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota and the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, and that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 5 (by Senator Kyle).

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission in its various decisions has construed the transportation act as enlarging its jurisdiction over questions involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges, and has recognized as the controlling element in such decisions the revenue needs of the carriers in a particular group without particularization or definiteness as to the extent of discrimination between persons, companies, firms, corporations, or localities, which was the extent of its jurisdiction prior to the transportation act as evidenced by court decisions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate, the house concurring therein. That we urge our Senators and Members of Congress to use their influence and best endeavor to have the transportation act amended restricting the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over matters involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges to that exercised under the interstate commerce act and prior to the passage of the transportation act.

Resolved further. That we urge our Senators and Members of Congress and all other Members of the Congress of the United States to support Senate bill 1150, introduced by Senator CAPPER, and House bill 7947, introduced by Representative HOCH, which bills provide for the amendment of the transportation act and limit the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission over matters involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges to that formerly exercised by that body prior to the passage of the transportation act.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the senate and passed that body January 16, 1923.

BEN S. PAULEN,
President of the Senate.
ARTHUR S. MCNAY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the house January 17, 1923.

CHAS. E. MANN,
Speaker of the House.
LISIE McELHINNEY,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Approved, January 22, 1923.

JONATHAN M. DAVIS,
Governor.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk concurrent resolutions passed by the legislature of the State of South Dakota in regard, first, to Federal farm loans; second, Federal standards for grading grain; third, freight rates for grain and live stock; and, fourth, completion of a steel bridge at Chamberlain, S. Dak. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD and properly referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the resolutions will be referred as indicated.

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to give immediate and careful consideration to Senate bill 4130.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas a bill raising the limit on Federal farm loans from $10,000 to $25,000 has been introduced in Congress, and which is now in the Committee on Banking and Currency;

Therefore we urge our delegation in Congress to do their utmost to secure speedy and favorable action by the committee and, thereafter, its prompt passage by Congress, so that it may become the law before March 1, 1923, at which time there are many Federal farm loans to be closed exceeding $10,000 in amount.

That the passage of this bill will not in any manner impair the operation nor the credit of the Federal land bank, but will result in extending its scope of usefulness so that a larger number of borrowers can be reached.

That all loans are made on the basis of the security offered, and borrowers of large amounts often offer the best security, owing to their executive ability and industry in the management of farm operation.

That the Federal land bank is seriously hampered in its operation owing to the $10,000 limit; be it further

Resolved. That engrossed copies of this resolution be prepared by the secretary of state, signed by the presiding officers of the senate and house of representatives, and forward one copy each to Senators NORBECK and STERLING and Congressmen CHRISTOPHERSON, JOHNSON, and WILLIAMSON, to the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to his Excellency, the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

CARL GUNDERSON,
President of the Senate.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. D. FRESKOLN,
Speaker of the House.
WRIGHT TARBELL,
Chief Clerk of the House.

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution requesting and demanding modification and revision of the present Federal standards for grading grain.

Be it enacted by the senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring). That the Bureau of Markets of the United States Department of Agriculture, in the spring of 1917, promulgated certain standards for grading wheat, which revolutionized the system of grain inspection to such an extent that the markets were seriously disturbed and confused, and the Federal rules were found unsatisfactory in commercial transactions; and as subsequent attempts by the said Bureau of Markets to amend the original standards and inspection rules have not removed the features objectionable to the wheat producers of South Dakota and the rural shippers of grain, with the result that the present standards are regarded by the farmers of the Northwest as unfair and unreasonable; and

Whereas the grades so established do not meet with the approval of the grain growers and shippers of this State and are believed to confer an undue advantage to the buyers, with a consequent discrimination against the farmers, thereby causing heavy losses every year; and

Whereas the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, at a meeting held in Helena, Mont., March 16, 1918, by formal resolution proposed standards for grading spring wheat, which were declared to be fair to all interests directly concerned; and

Whereas the South Dakota Farm Bureau Federation, the South Dakota Farmers Grain Dealers' Association, and other farm and grain organizations repeatedly have declared in favor of substantial modification of the Federal standards so that grain may be tested and graded in accordance with its milling value, and representatives of the States of the Northwest having appeared before the Federal Department of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture of both Houses of Congress advocating and urging action favorable to the requests and needs of the farmers of South Dakota; and

Whereas the legislators of Minnesota and North Dakota directed the promulgation of State grades for use in the inspection of grain produced and marketed within those States, the purposes of such legislation being to give the wheat producers of those States all the benefits possible from the application of State rules and regulations, but this plan was found not feasible because of conflict with the Federal rules and laws; and

Whereas the Millers' National Federation has opposed the efforts of the farmers of the State to obtain a modification and revisions of the Federal grain standards; and

Whereas HALVOR STEENERSON, Congressman from the ninth district of Minnesota, has introduced a bill in Congress to establish standards for grading spring wheat, which, if adopted, will virtually recognize the milling value of wheat and place the producers and the buyers on an equal footing in the grain markets of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, That it hereby, in behalf of the people of South Dakota, requests and demands that the Federal authorities, either in Congress or in the Department of Agriculture, do so modify, revise, or amend the present Federal standards for grading spring wheat as to comply with the requests of the farmers of South Dakota and the Northwest, and thereby remove the present discriminations and penalties, in order to promote the prosperity and welfare of the agricultural interests of South Dakota and the Northwest; be it further

Resolved, That we approve the aforesaid Steenerson grain grading bill and urge its immediate passage by Congress; be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, to both Houses of Congress, and to the individual members of the South Dakota delegation in Congress.

CARL GUNDERSON,
President of the Senate.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. O. FRESCOLN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WRIGHT TARBELL,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

To the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

A concurrent resolution requesting and demanding modification and reduction of the present freight rates for grain and live stock.

Whereas the present freight rates for shipment of grain and live stock by the railroads are excessive and of such a nature as to render the prices received by producers of such commodities less than the cost of production; and

Whereas several efforts have been made by the railroad commissioners of the State of South Dakota to secure reductions that are necessary for the preservation of the great industry of agriculture in the State of South Dakota; and

Whereas the rates now in force are approximately 20 per cent higher than the rates in force prior to 1918; and

Whereas the prices of farm products to the producer in this State are approximately 20 per cent lower than the average prices received by such producers for such commodities during the 10-year period just preceding the year 1918: Be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That it hereby in behalf of the people of the State of South Dakota requests and demands that the Congress of the United States, by appropriate legislation or otherwise, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and all other bodies of the Federal Government having in their power or discretion to modify, reduce, revise, or amend the present freight rates, perform such duties as to comply with the requests of the farmers of the State of South Dakota and the Northwest, and thereby remove this menace to the prosperity and welfare of the agricultural interests of South Dakota and the Northwest; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be prepared by the secretary of state and forwarded to our Representatives and Senators in Congress, to the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to his excellency the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

CARL GUNDERSON,
President of the Senate.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. O. FRESCOLN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WRIGHT TARBELL,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

To the Committee on Commerce:

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress and our Senators and Representatives in Congress to amend section 2 of House Resolution 8744, approved December 21, 1921, and enact in lieu thereof an act to require the completion of a steel bridge at Chamberlain, S. Dak., as required by act of Congress approved April 28, 1916, said bridge to be completed during the year 1923.

Whereas by an act of Congress dated April 28, 1916, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. was authorized to construct a steel bridge across the Missouri River at Chamberlain, S. Dak., and permission granted to continue the use of a pontoon bridge for the transportation of freight and passengers across said river until the completion of said steel bridge; and

Whereas the right to construct said bridge was extended by act of Congress approved February 25, 1919, and by a further act of Congress approved December 21, 1921, which last-named act extends the time for the completion of said bridge to April 28, 1925; and

Whereas said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. began the construction of and completed a portion of said bridge in the year 1918, but has wholly failed to do anything toward the completion thereof since the early part of 1919; and

Whereas the use of said pontoon bridge is believed to endanger the lives of the employees of said railroad operating trains thereon and the lives of the traveling public; and

Whereas serious and costly accidents and delays in transportation have already occurred, to wit:

First. That on or about June 21, 1922, while a gravel train was crossing said bridge the pontoon used as a draw upset and caused the engine and several cars to be thrown into the Missouri River, together with the engineer, who was seriously injured.

Second. That during the spring of the year when the ice is going out and during the June rise and in the fall of the year, and when the ice is forming or floating in said river, it is impossible to operate the draw in said bridge, and by reason of that fact all passenger, mail, freight, and express traffic to points west of the Missouri River is greatly delayed, especially when said bridge is out or draw open, and the development of the country deterred, and the business interests of the people located between Chamberlain and Rapid City, S. Dak., jeopardized: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States and our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, urged to use all honorable means at their command to secure an amendment to section 2 of House Resolution 8744, which shall require the completion of said bridge not later than during the year 1923; and be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this preamble and resolution be prepared by the secretary of the senate, signed by the presiding officers of the senate and house of representatives and forwarded to the Congress of the United States and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Secretary of War.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a resolution of the Oklahoma Legislature with reference to Muscle Shoals.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Engrossed House Resolution 8 asking Congress to accept Henry Ford's offer for Muscle Shoals.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives in the Oklahoma Legislature of 1923 as follows:

Whereas the United States Government, for the purpose of rendering useful the immense power running to waste at Muscle Shoals, has spent large sums of the people's money in the construction of dams, etc., and is still expending large sums in the completion of the work begun; and

Whereas in the summer of 1921 the War Department forwarded letters to certain prominent men, firms, and corporations asking if they would consider taking the job of completing the work and operating the plant, one of which letters was sent to Henry Ford, of Detroit, Mich.; and

Whereas Henry Ford was the only person, firm, or corporation who responded favorably to said invitation; and

Whereas Henry Ford did respond by offering to lease said plant from the Government for a period of 100 years, he to complete the plant at actual cost, or the Government to complete it, and when completed Mr. Ford to pay an annual rental to the Government of an amount equal to 4 per cent of the total cost of construction, and at the end of the lease return the property to the Government; and

Whereas the farmers of the South and Southwest believe that Henry Ford by his operation of said plant can save them at least $75,000,000 each year in the production of cotton alone with his cheap fertilizer; and

Whereas besides the nitrates to be obtained from the air there are rich deposits of phosphates near Muscle Shoals by the use of which on the Corn Belt soils it is possible to double the yield; and

Whereas Henry Ford's offer includes the production of great electric power to take the place of coal rendered expensive by long hauls; and

Whereas we believe Henry Ford's offer for said plant is fair to the Government, and that his operation of said plant will greatly inure to the benefit of the farmers throughout the entire United States; and Strike out section 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "SEC. 15. Where premises within such Indian grants or purchases, or any part or parcel thereof, on the trial of any such action, are shown not to be the property of the non-Indian claimant under the provisions of this act, but if the claimant acquired the same in good faith and improved such premises by the expenditure of labor or money, believing that he was the lawful owner thereof, in view of equitable considerations he may make application to the Secretary of the Interior to purchase the same, who may allow the application, at such price and upon such terms as he may fix, excluding the value of the improvements, and the money thus derived shall constitute a trust fund to be laid out in the purchase of other lands for the particular pueblo, either within or without the grant or purchase area, and if no suitable lands are purchasable then such fund, at such time as the said Secretary may deem advisable, may be surrendered to the pueblo."

"SEC. 16. In the sense in which used in this act the word 'purchase' shall be taken to mean lands acquired by the Indians other than by grant or donation from a sovereign."

"SEC. 17. Any person not impleaded in any such action may demand to be made a party defendant thereto, with benefit of disclaimer in a proper case, or may intervene in such action, setting up his claim in usual form, and the Government may disclaim in answer to such intervention in like manner as it might have disclaimed in the original bill."

"SEC. 18. Where, as a result of this act, the Indians shall have lost any lands under the plea of limitations, without color of title, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be selected and set off to the Indian pueblo from any part of the public domain a tract or tracts of land of value equal to the unimproved value of the land thus lost; and if the Indians desire the land thus selected and set off to be sold, at the request of the Indian council the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be sold under such plan as he may define, and the proceeds to be applied as he may deem best for the benefit of the Indians or in the purchase of lands held in alien ownership within the pueblo grant or 'purchase.'

SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE ROLAND W. BOYDEN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD in 8-point type a letter from the Secretary of State transmitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday, together with two previous letters, which are very brief, but which are necessary to an understanding of the situation in regard to the Reparation Commission, with which the letter of the Secretary of State deals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the document the Senator from Massachusetts had printed in the RECORD?

Mr. LODGE. A letter of the Secretary of State which came to the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday, which was given to the press and which I think ought to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it a very long letter, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. It was printed in the press, but I think not completely.

Mr. HARRISON. I read what was in the press, but I do not think the letter was printed in full.

Mr. LODGE. No; that is one reason why I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is not too long, it might be well to have it read, because it is a matter in which we are all interested.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that is necessary; it would only cause delay.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The matter ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 18, 1919.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE,

Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There are some things in connection with the execution of the treaty of peace which can hardly await the action of the several Governments which must act with regard to the ratification of the treaty, and the chief of these is the functioning of the Reparation Commission. It is of so much importance to the business interests of the United States, as well as to the nations with which we are associated, that the United States should be represented on that commission, and represented now while the work of the commission is taking shape, that I am taking the liberty of writing to ask if you will not be kind enough to consult the Committee on Foreign Relations with regard to this particular appointment, and say to them that I would very much appreciate their approval of my appointing provisionally a representative of the United States to act upon the Reparation Commission.

Very sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

JULY 22, 1919.

To the PRESIDENT.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In accordance with my note to you of Sunday last, I laid your letter of July 18 before the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday morning. In that letter you suggested that you would be glad to receive the approval of the committee for the provisional appointment of a member of the Reparation Commission which is to be established when the treaty with Germany goes into effect.

The committee instructs me to say that it is the judgment of the committee that until the proposed treaty is ratified in accordance with its terms no power exists to execute any of its provisions, either provisionally or otherwise.

I have the honor to be, respectfully yours,

H. C. LODGE, Chairman.

JANUARY 25, 1923.

The following correspondence between the Secretary of State and Senator LODGE, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, was made public to-day:

On January 16, 1923, the Secretary of State wrote a letter to Senator LODGE outlining, in accordance with his request, the origin and nature of the association of the American observer with the work of the Reparation Commission.

On January 20 Senator LODGE, on behalf of the committee, requested certain additional information with respect to specified points. The Secretary of State, in compliance with this request, wrote a further letter on January 25, 1923.

The two letters are as follows:

JANUARY 16, 1923.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: Referring to our conversation regarding Mr. Boyden's duties in Paris at the present time as American observer with the Reparation Commission, I take pleasure in outlining briefly the origin and nature of his association with the work of that body.

Following the signature of the treaty of Versailles on June 28, 1919, and pending its ratification (the treaty came into effect on January 10, 1920) the committee on organization of the Reparation Commission was created for the purpose of inaugurating informally the work of the permanent commission contemplated by the treaty, and members of the American peace delegation participated in the work of this committee during the summer and fall of 1919.

Upon the departure of the American peace commissioners in December, 1919, Mr. Albert Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, remained in Paris and attended the meetings of the organization committee of the Reparation Commission. Mr. Rathbone was instructed to keep in close touch with reparation matters, both in order that this Government might be fully informed of developments and also to safeguard the interests of the United States.

At a meeting of the organization committee of the Reparation Commission on January 9, 1920, the United States Government was invited, through Mr. Rathbone, to attend unofficially the meetings of the commission. It was understood, of course, that the United States would not vote or take formal part in the work of the commission. Mr. Rathbone was authorized to accept the invitation thus extended, and on January 24, 1920, he and Col. James A. Logan, jr., attended unofficially the first meeting of the commission.

Since Mr. Rathbone was unable to remain in Paris, Mr. Roland W. Boyden succeeded him in the spring of 1920 as special representative of the United States Treasury at Paris, and attended the meetings of the Reparation Commission in his place. The salaries and expenses of Mr. Boyden and of his alternate, Colonel Logan, have been and are paid by the Government of the United States. The plan of organization adopted by the Reparation Commission made provision, in the case of each national delegation, for office accommodations, as well as for the necessary funds for subordinate staff, and similar provision was made by the commission for the offices and staff needed by Mr. Boyden. This Government saw no reason for objecting to this arrangement.

On February 11, 1921, the previous administration instructed Mr. Boyden to announce to the Reparation Commission his retirement, which he did on February 19, 1921. However, on May 7, 1921, pursuant to an invitation from the allied governments that the United States resume its previous relations with the commission, Mr. Boyden was instructed to attend its meetings as an observer. He has continued to act as an observer since that time. He does not vote or take part as an official representative on the commission, but he is advised as to its transactions and is in a position informally to express his opinion as occasion may make it appropriate for him to do so.

It is deemed to be of great importance to this Government that it should be informed in detail of the proceedings of the Reparation Commission. The work of the commission has such an intimate relation to political and economic conditions that we should be advised of whatever takes place. It is manifest that in view of the extent and character of the commission's work and the intricacy of the many problems with which it deals, this information could not be secured through the ordinary diplomatic channels. In addition to the general information which we ought to have so that we may be prepared to act intelligently in any exigency, there are questions arising from time to time in which this Government and its citizens have an immediate interest. These purposes have been served by the contact with the commission which we have been able to maintain through the present arrangements.

I am, my dear Senator LODGE,

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

JANUARY 25, 1923.

The Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: In my letter of January 16, 1923, I outlined, in accordance with your request, the origin and nature of the association of the American observer with the work of the Reparation Commission. I also pointed out the great importance to this Government of having detailed information of the proceedings of the Reparation Commission and of being able to protect the interests of the United States in the various matters with which that commission is concerned. I may repeat that the present arrangements are intended to serve this purpose.

On Saturday last you advised me that the Committee on Foreign Relations desired additional information with respect to certain specified points, and it gives me pleasure to comply with their request.

First, you ask for—

"Report of the committee on guaranties to the Reparation Commission, made after their last visit to Berlin (in October?); also Reparation Commission Document 1462, 'Economic Survey of Germany, September, 1922.'"

I send you herewith the following papers:

"Report of the committee of guaranties:

"Annex No. 1532, a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, Part I, and

"Annex No. 1532, i, bis, Part II;

"Annex No. 1532, j, Part II, first section;

"Annex No. 1532, k, l, Part II, section 2;

"Annex No. 1532, m, Part II, section 3;

"Annex No. 1532, n, Part II, section 4;

"Note by the French representative on the committee of guaranties, Annex 1595; and

"Memorandum by British representative on committee of guaranties, Annex No. 1595, b."

You will observe that each of these documents is marked "confidential," being the confidential print of the Reparation Commission. As the restriction of confidence has not been removed by the commission with respect to these documents, I am sending them to you with the understanding that they will remain in the confidence of the Committee on Foreign Relations and will not be made public.

I also inclose the following papers:

"Annex No. 1462, a, b, and Annex No. 1462, c, d, being 'Reply from the German Government to the letters of the Reparation Commission dated March 21, 1922 (Annex 1353) and April 13, 1922 (Annex No. 1390), concerning the measures to be taken by the German Government regarding the maintenance of the provisional postponement.'"

This is the only "Reparation Commission Document 1462" with which I am acquainted, and I believe that it is the document to which your request refers. While Annex No. 1462, a, b, and Annex No. 1462, c, d, bear the mark "confidential," I understand that the restriction has been released and that these documents are subject to public use.

Second, You ask for—

"Report of bankers, including financial correspondence in June or July, 1922."

I inclose "Report of the loan committee to the Reparation Commission," being annex No. 1478, which is the report of the committee of bankers. This has already been made public.

I do not understand what is meant by "financial correspondence in June or July, 1922," and I must ask that this request be made more specific.

Third, You request further—

"Copy of the so-called Boyden plan."

I handed you some days ago the public statement that I made on January 16, 1923, with reference to the false reports that had been published to the effect that an "American reparation plan" had been submitted to the Reparation Commission. I then said that neither I nor anyone in behalf of the Department of State had approved any plan for submission to the Reparation Commission or had authorized any such submission.

It appeared from the press dispatches from Paris that the misleading reports had reference to a memorandum which had been prepared by Mr. Boyden in November last, and a copy of which had been sent to the Department of State and had been received about December 1. This memorandum, however, was not in any sense a plan for the settlement of reparations nor was it authorized by the department. As so much had appeared in the public press which was likely to give rise to misapprehension, I made public in the statement above mentioned the circumstances in which this memorandum had been prepared.

It is understood that on November 13, 1922, Mr. Boyden had been requested by one or more members of the Reparation Commission to draft, as a purely personal suggestion, a proposed letter to be sent by the Reparation Commission to the German Government on lines he had informally indicated. This Mr. Boyden did in the memorandum in question, which he gave as a draft to one of the members of the Reparation Commission. This memorandum contained no plan for the settlement of reparations; no suggestion as to amounts, time, or manner of payments. It dealt with general considerations as to the necessity of establishing confidence, and especially as to the importance of the attitude of the German Government in expressing Germany's national will for peace. The memorandum was prepared and submitted by Mr. Boyden as a personal matter and without consultation with the Department of State. When its text was subsequently received by the department it was not regarded as a plan for the settlement of reparations or as requiring any action whatever on the part of the department. It was deemed to be a personal memorandum which Mr. Boyden had already submitted to one of the members of the commission, of a general nature, and which merely emphasized some of the fundamental considerations which were deemed to be pertinent to the situation in a large way. At the time that the memorandum was forwarded to the department it was also advised that the situation had changed since Mr. Boyden had prepared his draft, by the receipt of the German proposals.

The department heard nothing further about the memorandum or its submission until January 13, 1923, when it received a cable message, sent the day before, that this suggestion of Mr. Boyden was to be placed on the commission's agenda, and that the memorandum had been revised slightly in language but not in substance. Thereupon, on January 14, 1923, I telegraphed Mr. Boyden that when the question of replying to Germany should come up in the commission, he should refrain from expressing any opinion and from urging the consideration of his suggestions in the absence of instructions from the department.

As further misleading reports continued to come from Paris, I telegraphed again the next day—January 15—repeating my request that no opinion should be expressed and no plan submitted without express directions from the department; also that the memorandum had in no sense received the approval of the department. I had cabled for the revised text of the memorandum and this was received on January 16. I understand that no further action has been taken with respect to the memorandum.

As I must assume, in the absence of anything else, that the memorandum in question is what is described as the "so-called Boyden plan" in your request, I inclose a copy of the memorandum of Mr. Boyden as originally prepared and also a copy of its revised text. I am advised that this memorandum is still held in confidence by the Reparation Commission, and I am therefore sending it to you with the understanding that it will be held in confidence by your committee.

Fourth. Again, you ask for—

"Copy of any instructions given to Mr. Boyden at the time of his appointment by the present and the previous administrations; also copy of any other instructions issued to him from time to time."

Without in any manner derogating from the constitutional authority of the President in the conduct of foreign affairs, it is my desire to inform your committee as to the steps that have been taken, in the matter in question, in order to protect the interests of this Government. In anticipation of the formal organization of the Reparation Commission, the Department of State on December 19, 1919, telegraphed Mr. Rathbone, who was then an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and had remained in Paris after the departure of the American peace commissioners, the following instructions:

"You will realize, in view of the nonratification of the United States, that you can not officially take part in the deliberations of the Reparation Commission, which derives its authority from the provisions of the German treaty; but in order to safeguard the vital interests of the United States in matters which may come before the commission you are authorized on the formal organization of the Reparation Commission unofficially to attend its meetings and in accordance with instructions received from time to time give expression to the views of the Government in regard to the above matters when deemed necessary in performance of your duty.

"You may extend similar authorization to your assistants to attend meetings of subcommittees of the Reparation Commission."

Again, on December 27, 1919, Mr. Rathbone was instructed as follows:

"It is intended that you shall, of course, continue acting as heretofore on organization committee, and that upon the organization of the permanent Reparation Commission and until the United States takes definite action in respect to the treaty, or until further notice, you shall, with the approval of the other Governments concerned, attend the meetings of the commission unofficially. As the prime object of your attending those meetings will be to protect the interests of the United States, it will naturally be necessary for you, in order to do so, to participate unofficially in the discussions of any questions arising which concern the United States. The internal organization of the commission and its methods of dealing with the various problems would have considerable bearing on a constructive handling of the various problems; and, as any actions of the commission which might be unsound from a financial and economic standpoint would seriously affect the United States, you should use your best endeavors in advocating the adoption of sound constructive policies."

Then at a meeting of the organization committee of the Reparation Commission on January 9, 1920, an invitation was extended to the American delegation, through Mr. Rathbone, to attend unofficially the meetings of the commission, it being expressly recognized that attending in this manner they would not have the privilege of voting.

The first meeting of the Reparation Commission was held on January 24, 1920, and according to the minutes Mr. Rathbone and Colonel Logan "attended unofficially during part of the meeting." Col. James A. Logan, United States Army, had been Mr. Rathbone's principal assistant in connection with these matters.

Mr. Rathbone being unable to remain in Paris, Mr. Roland W. Boyden succeeded him. Mr. Boyden is a lawyer of distinction, residing at Boston, and had been connected with the Food Administration under Mr. Hoover. Mr. Boyden attended the meetings of the Reparation Commission in Mr. Rathbone's place, and Colonel Logan acted as his assistant. This course was followed until shortly before the end of the previous administration; that is to say, until February 19, 1921, when the unofficial observers were withdrawn.

When the present administration came into power it was felt that this Government should not forego the opportunity to be made fully cognizant of all the proceedings of the Reparation Commission, and that it was advisable, in order that our information should be complete and our interests should be properly safeguarded, that we should again have the advantages derived from the position of our observers.

Accordingly on May 6, 1921, in response to an invitation extended to this Government, it was publicly announced that Mr. Boyden's attendance in an unofficial capacity in connection with the Reparation Commission would be resumed, and on May 7, 1921, the Department of State sent the following instruction to Mr. Boyden:

"You should immediately inform the chairman of the Reparation Commission that you have been instructed by your Government, in response to the request made by the supreme council, to resume your unofficial position on the commission. You should, as formerly, keep the department informed by cable of the discussions and decisions of the commission with your comments thereon."

I have thus stated, as requested, the instructions given to our observers by the present and the previous administrations. It is impracticable, however, for me to attempt to set forth the other instructions which have been issued from time to time on account of their large number and the varied subjects to which they relate. The work of the Reparation Commission covers an enormous field and its transactions are very extensive. The Department of State has been for about three years in almost constant receipt of information and has sent numerous instructions both with respect to the importance of being advised upon various points and with reference to the protection of particular interests of the United States. For this reason I could not attempt to set forth all the instructions, and I am quite sure that this would serve no useful purpose. If your committee desires information upon any particular point I shall be glad to furnish it to the best of my ability.

I should say, however, that it has not been the policy of this administration to participate in the fixing of the amounts to be paid by Germany upon reparation claims; and particularly with respect to the discussions that have been going on during the past few months before the Reparation Commission in relation to the amounts and terms of Germany's reparation payments, the department has cautioned its observer not to take any position that would involve this Government in these discussions.

As showing some of the subjects which have engaged the attention of the American observers, and as to which instructions and requests for information have been sent from time to time, I may mention:

- (1) Costs of the American army of occupation.
- (2) Interest of the United States in safeguarding the rights, reserved by the joint resolution of Congress of July 2, 1921, under the treaties of Versailles, St. Germain, and Trianon, the benefits of which are secured to the United States by the treaties with Germany, Austria, and Hungary.
- (3) American interests in Austrian and Hungarian pre-war bonds and in the currency notes of the Austro-Hungarian Bank, now in liquidation.
- (4) Lien of the United States on reparation receipts by certain countries.
- (5) Austrian relief, involving the question of the release of Austrian assets pledged to the United States.
- (6) Relief and food purchases by European Governments other than Austria.
- (7) American interests in German oil tankers.
- (8) Various shipping questions.
- (9) Effect of reparation payments on the foreign exchanges.

(10) Instructions as to the position of this Government regarding alien property in the United States.

(11) Information with respect to the Brussels conference of 1920 and other conferences.

In addition there are the general subjects of inquiry and report by reason of the importance of the Reparation Commission as a source of information dealing with economic and political questions in Europe. There has thus been received currently a mass of valuable material.

In conclusion I may say with respect to the work of the American observers that it has been distinctly understood that no opinions were to be expressed on behalf of this Government, except under specific instructions from the Department of State.

Fifth. Your next request is for—

"Information as to the staff of Mr. Boyden, where maintained, cost of maintenance, etc."

Mr. Boyden is the American observer and Colonel Logan is the assistant observer.

Mr. Boyden receives a salary at the rate of $5,000 a year and in addition has an allowance for expenses not to exceed $1,000 a month, thus limiting the total amount of his compensation and allowance for expenses to $17,000 a year. This amount was fixed in July, 1920, and has been continued since that time.

Mr. Boyden has received and receives no compensation or allowance from the Reparation Commission.

Colonel Logan received no salary other than his Army pay until he resigned from the Army in the summer of 1922, and since his resignation he has been paid a salary at the rate of $4,000 a year. He receives in addition an allowance for expenses not to exceed $6,000 per annum, making the limit of his salary and allowance for expenses $10,000 a year.

Colonel Logan has received and receives no compensation or allowance from the Reparation Commission.

I should add that the assistant observer acts as alternate to Mr. Boyden and is on the same basis as to unofficial status, and has been in attendance at meetings of the committee of guaranties and of other committees which have been constituted of the assistant delegates to the Reparation Commission from other countries. This work has been of large importance and has involved a great deal of detail.

The secretarial and clerical staff consists of 21 persons, being a secretary and assistants, a registrar, file clerks, stenographers, and messengers. This staff is maintained at 15 rue de Tilsitt, Paris, the quarters being furnished and the expenses in connection therewith defrayed by the Reparation Commission. Aside from the expense of these premises, the total cost of this staff, with the exception of four messengers, is $4,887.09 per month. The cost of the four messengers is 2,200 francs a month.

The cost of this staff, as well as the expense of its quarters, is paid by the Reparation Commission. This matter was taken up in May, 1920, under the previous administration, and the arrangement which was definitely approved in July, 1920, has since been continued. There seemed to be no reason why the expense of these facilities should not be defrayed by the Reparation Commission, as the commission was willing to defray it, there being no inherent objection to this, any more than to the agreement to pay the cost of the American Army of occupation.

There are two other persons who have been associated with the American observers but who have rendered technical and expert services to the Reparation Commission and have been paid for these services by it. These are Hugh A. Bayne and Ralph H. Hess.

Mr. Bayne is an American lawyer of high ability, who before the war practiced in New York City for many years. He served with the American Expeditionary Forces in France and has remained there, being now a member of the legal firm of Coudert Bros. He is connected with the legal service of the Reparation Commission and renders services to the commission as a lawyer, and is paid by the commission precisely as any lawyer would be paid for similar services. When the American unofficial observers were withdrawn in February, 1921, Mr. Bayne continued to render legal services to the commission. Mr. Bayne receives no compensation from the Government of the United States. He is paid by the commission, as his total compensation and allowance for expenses, at the rate of $961.48 a month.

These services of Mr. Bayne do not affect in any way the unofficial status of the American observers. This was distinctly understood, and the Department of State was advised under date of July 1, 1920, upon this point as follows:

"Understanding perfectly clear and so expressed by members commission when decision taken that all payments based solely on theory that commission merely paying compensation for outside assistance rendered to commission in its work. Delegation retains absolute unofficial character unchanged."

The same may be said of Mr. Hess, who is paid by the commission for technical or expert services in connection with the finance service, and receives a total compensation and allowance for expenses at the rate of $768.54 a month.

I am also advised that Colonel Winship has rendered expert services to the Reparation Commission in connection with the service of restitution and reparation in kind, and that Captain Madison has rendered services in a similar way in relation to maritime matters and questions of valuation. Neither Colonel Winship nor Captain Madison has received a salary from the commission, but they have had allowances other than salary at the rate of $704.23 in the case of Colonel Winship and $714.63 in the case of Captain Madison.

The only expense to the Government of the United States in this whole matter (aside from the Army and Navy pay of Colonel Winship and Captain Madison) is the amount of compensation and expense allowances paid Mr. Boyden and Colonel Logan, and this amount, as already stated, does not exceed $27,000 a year.

Sixth. Finally, you ask:

"Exact fund from which Messrs. Boyden and Logan receive compensation."

Mr. Boyden and Colonel Logan are paid out of the emergency fund of the State Department.

I remain, my dear Senator LODGE,

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a matter of urgency requiring the passage of the bill (S. 4390) to amend the last paragraph of Section 10 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of June 3, 1922. I ask at this time unanimous consent that the measure be taken up for immediate consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah requests unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 4390.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to join in the request of the Senator from Utah that permission be granted to consider this bill. I am certain it will only require a few moments to dispose of it. It relates to the authorization for the construction of branch bank buildings by the Federal reserve banks. It will be recalled by the Senate that some time ago the law touching the subject was modified so as to prohibit the reserve banks from constructing buildings the total cost of which would be in excess of $250,000. It has been found that in a number of cases plans for the erection of branch bank buildings had already been adopted when the law was modified restricting the right of the reserve banks to construct the buildings. If the law be amended by the passage of the bill for which consideration is now asked, the reserve banks will be enabled to construct those buildings.

The bill proposes to authorize the construction of buildings where the cost of the building proper does not exceed $250,000; that is, excluding the cost of vaults, equipment, and fixtures. If passed, it will enable the reserve banks to construct a number of buildings, including the branch bank buildings at Salt Lake City, Utah, and Little Rock, Ark.

It will also be recalled that the Senate some time ago passed a joint resolution known as the Spencer resolution, which authorized the construction of a bank building at St. Louis, Mo., and branch bank buildings at Salt Lake City, Utah, and Little Rock, Ark. That measure passed the other House with amendments, and, although a conference report on the measure was submitted, that conference report has been pending for quite a length of time. It appears that some difficulty has been found in securing consideration of the report. In any event, the matter has not been disposed of.

This bill was originally introduced in the House of Representatives by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of that body. It has been favorably reported, as I understand unanimously, by the House committee. The object in passing the pending bill here now is to facilitate the legislation so as to make certain that the measure may be enacted prior to the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this subject has been one which has been prolific of debate. I should have no objection to the consideration of the bill if it could be disposed of within a few minutes. If the Senator from Utah will withdraw the bill, if debate on it shall run over 15 minutes, I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly shall do so, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin. I believe, however, the consideration of the bill will take but a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of June 3, 1922, is amended to read as follows:

"No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any branch bank building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any such building, if the cost of the building proper, exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures, is in excess of $250,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to any building now under construction."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word or two. The only amendment to the existing law which is proposed by the pending bill is the insertion, after the word "building," of the words "proper, exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures." Those words are proposed to be added to the existing law.

The joint resolution referred to by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was passed by the Senate on June 30 of last year. Subsequently it passed the House of Representatives and went to conference. There is objection to the form in which the joint resolution passed the House, for the reason that it is proposed to authorize the erection of branch bank buildings based upon a certain percentage of their assets. That would give some branch banks of the Federal system three or four times the amount which would be available to some other branch banks in some other districts. For instance, in the Arkansas district they would not have enough money to erect a bank building of the proper size, while in the Salt Lake City district there would be an authorization to expend too much money for the purpose under the provision as the House passed the measure. So the only change in the law provided in this bill, which, I understand, is acceptable to both the Senate and House conferees on the joint resolution referred to, is the insertion of the words to which I have referred. The existing law reads:

No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any branch bank building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any such building, if the cost of the building is in excess of $250,000.

Under the proposed amendment of the law it will read:

If the cost of the building proper, exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures, is in excess of $250,000.

That is the change proposed of the existing law.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is intended that this proposed legislation shall take the place of a number of resolutions that have been presented and that it shall provide a permanent law to cover all cases?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the object of the bill. The bill has been reported by the Senate committee just as it passed the other House; so that if it shall pass the Senate that will be the end of the matter.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRELD. I wish to make an inquiry. Somewhere along the line the branch banks at Salt Lake City and Little Rock have been included. Was that done in the House, in the Senate, or in conference?

Mr. SMOOT. That was done in the Senate as to Salt Lake City, and that city was added simply because of the fact that in that case the land had been purchased and the plans had been virtually drawn. Therefore Salt Lake City was put into the bill when it was under consideration by the Senate.

Mr. HARRELD. I have no objection to the provision for those two cities; I am merely asking about the procedure. I wish to know if either of those two cities were added in conference without first having been passed upon by the House of Representatives?

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma they were not. The Spencer joint resolution as originally presented proposed to authorize the St. Louis bank proper to construct a building for its main offices and a building for the branch bank at Little Rock. The Senate amended the joint resolution so as to include the branch bank at Salt Lake City. The bill, however, went to the House of Representatives and was amended so as to strike out provision for the branch banks and to leave the measure so that the main building at St. Louis could be constructed. It passed the House of Representatives with those amendments, and the measure then went to conference. A conference report was submitted, in which it was proposed that the House recede from its amendments to the joint resolution. The conference report, however, was never agreed to. There were a number of cases where it appeared desirable to construct branch bank buildings, and the House seemingly took the position that a measure of a general character should be enacted. That is the measure of which the Senator from Utah has procured consideration.

Mr. HARRELD. The point I want to make is this—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator further, so that he will have the whole matter before him, that the provision as it passed the House and the Senate read as follows:

That the total investment in such building shall not exceed an amount equal to 25 per cent of its paid-in capital stock and surplus.

I have referred to the fact that in some cases that would give altogether too much money to erect a branch bank building in some places, while in other cases it would not provide enough. Therefore, the bill which I am asking the Senate now to pass was agreed upon to take the place of that measure.

Mr. HARRELD. That does not give me the information I want. I have heard it stated that the conference committee added things to the joint resolution in relation to two of the branch banks that were not in the bill as it passed the House and were not in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is not correct.

Mr. HARRELD. I am inquiring to know whether that is true?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the fact.

Mr. HARRELD. I have no objection, of course, to Little Rock being included, but I am opposed to methods of procedure such as I have indicated, and that is the reason for my inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated that the original measure embraced a bank building at St. Louis and a branch bank at Little Rock, and the Senate incorporated an amendment relating to Salt Lake City.

Mr. HARRELD. I presume, then, I was merely misinformed about it, and in view of the Senator's statement, which I accept, that will end it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language was somewhat changed, but provision for buildings at all those places was made in the joint resolution as it passed the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANTICOKE RIVER BRIDGE, DEL.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4346) granting the consent of Congress to the Delaware State Highway Department to construct a bridge across the Nanticoke River, and I submit a report (No. 1062) thereon. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is very anxious to have the bill passed to-day. It is in the usual form of such measures, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Delaware State Highway Department and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Nanticoke River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Seaford, in the county of Sussex, in the State of Delaware, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOOR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, at this time I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business to-day it shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, with the understanding that we will conclude the session reasonably early to-morrow afternoon and adjourn then until Monday, so that we may have a morning hour on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not disposed to object, but I think it is asking a good deal to request Senators to be here at 11 o'clock to-morrow. The Senator promises, however, that he will not keep the Senate very late to-morrow and that an adjournment will be taken to-morrow afternoon to Monday. In view of that, I shall not interpose an objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that I will be willing to conclude the session to-morrow at not later than 4.30 o'clock.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I invite the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that eulogies are to be pronounced in the Chamber on Sunday? I do not know whether he will have to modify his request in view of that fact.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then we can adjourn to-morrow until Sunday, and we will adjourn, of course, on Sunday until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CANNON, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROBLEMS RELATING TO REFORESTATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to Senate Resolution 398, agreed to January 22, 1923, to investigate problems relating to reforestation, the Chair appoints the following Senators: Mr. MOSES, Mr. McNARY, Mr. COUZENS, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. FLETCHER.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in reference to this general subject I think there is a pronounced and well-justified demand all over the country for some system of supplying short-term credit to meet the needs of those engaged in agriculture.

The subject is not without difficulty. There has been one view of it to this effect: On account of the different laws in the different States, the different rates of interest prevailing in different States, the different kind of credit securities, the various and varying requirements as to chattel mortgages, and the distinct provisions as to liens on crops and on personal property generally the view has obtained very largely that these credit associations or agencies for supplying short-term personal credit ought, if possible, to be constituted of local organizations, and that such organizations ought to be created under State laws, if possible. In other words, there has been some doubt whether Congress ought to attempt by national legislation to enter that field and undertake to cover it in the face of the varying conditions and varying laws and requirements in the several States and localities.

If it were possible to have those engaged in agriculture organized in such sort that local credit unions would be formed, and in such a way as to bring about real cooperation among the farmers, it seems to me that would be a more desirable method of effecting what we are trying to do here. I regret to say that it appears, from what has developed in the country and what has been testified to before various committees, that the cooperative spirit among farmers in this country has not yet been sufficiently developed to bring about that condition which would form the soundest and best basis for short-term personal credit. In some States these credit unions have been organized. In some States cooperative societies and associations have been established, and wherever they have been established and are being conducted upon the true cooperative basis they are accomplishing very great beneficial results.

Some years ago this subject was under consideration by what was known as the American commission, with which the United States commission was created to cooperate in studying various systems of agricultural finance which had been established in the older countries of Europe, and which had been found to be eminently successful there. Those commissions visited the European countries. They sailed from New York and landed first in Genoa. They were received at the building built by the King of Italy in Rome as the home of the International Institute of Agriculture, and from there they visited the European countries, including Austria, Germany, the Scandinavian countries, Belgium, Holland, France, England, and Ireland; and they brought with them a mass of literature on the subject which has been of immense value to the people of this country, and especially to Congress, because it formed the basis and furnished the information upon which was constructed the farm loan act.

Those commissions reported at the same time that they submitted their report, on the main question of a plan for financial accommodations for farmers, embodied in Senate Document No. 214, something like 1,000 pages, and, as I say, embracing information and data which it would be impossible to obtain now, and never will be possible to obtain again, some views on the subject of short-term personal credit. The Europe they saw is dead, and the great agricultural development which had taken place there could scarcely be appreciated upon a visit to those countries to-day. However, those who have been in Europe comparatively recently tell me that the farms in Germany, especially, have been kept up, and show evidences of that splendid system known as the landschaft system, which had been in operation some 100 years in that country before the war. I am told, too, that the farms in Germany are virtually all free from mortgages. The mortgages were paid off in spite of the depreciated value of the mark. In spite of world conditions, in spite of what Germany has gone through, her farms to-day are practically free from mortgages and are in a high state of cultivation. Certainly the landschaft bonds, corresponding to the farm-loan bonds in this country, have been as readily salable as the Government bonds, and in fact never lost their standing as the highest securities offered in Germany.

We passed the farm-loan act. It has been in operation since 1916, except that it required from six to eight months to get the system organized. Under the law 12 district land banks had to be established in 12 different districts of the United States. Those banks had to be officered. The temporary organization required that the Farm Loan Board should name five directors for each of these banks until the stock in each of them to the amount of $100,000 was acquired by the national farm loan associations, and then they were to be permanently organized. Under that provision for permanent organization six directors in these banks were to be selected by the national farm loan associations, holding stock to the extent of $100,000 in each bank, and three of the directors were to be named by the Farm Loan Board. That was the plan of permanent organization. It never has been put into effect. The temporary organization continued, notwithstanding the national farm associations own more than $100,000 of the stock in every bank of the system, and in four of them practically all.

The system began to function, and was proceeding nicely until finally suit was instituted in the State of Missouri, in the United States court, attacking the constitutionality of the act, and especially assailing that feature of the act which exempted farm-loan bonds from all taxation. That suit was undoubtedly instituted by farm-mortgage associations doing private business which they had been engaged in for years, and in which they had been making enormous profits by charging farmers rates of interest which were oppressive in effect, and which those associations desired to continue without interruption and without opposition or competition; and they realized that once this farm-loan system was thoroughly established there would be very serious competition with them in the matter of making loans upon farms.

They brought the suit. The suit was won in the lower court by the Farm Loan Board and was carried to the Supreme Court. Finally, in February, 1921, the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the act in every respect; so that, that question being settled, the system for the first time had the chance to show what could be done under it. Since then over $700,000,000 have been found for farmers in the United States at 5 to 5½ per cent interest, payable on practically their own terms, the principal being paid at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, with the right to pay off any portion of the principal at any interest period.

Homes have been saved to farmers in this country. They have been able to develop their estates. They have been able to get their capital requirements, so far the demand has thus far been met, and to-day they are supplied with ample funds to respond to the demands to meet their needs in accordance with the purposes of the act. That has been accomplished by the issuing of farm-loan bonds against collective mortgages by the Federal land banks, as the law provides, and those bonds are readily salable on the market at above par. The last issue bears a rate of interest of 4½ per cent. Seventy-five million dollars of bonds were offered recently, and they were taken within two hours; so that those bonds are upon a splendid footing, and loans are being granted at the rate of $200,000,000 a year. They are designated as instrumentalities of the Government. They are backed by the personal obligation of the borrower and by a mortgage upon his farm at a valuation of 50 per cent of its value and 20 per cent of the insured value of improvements; they are backed also by the indorsement of the National Farm Loan Association of which the borrower is a member by a pledge of 5 per cent of the stock—5 per cent of the loan must be taken in stock in the Federal land bank—and by the Federal land bank itself, all issued under the supervision and control of a bureau of the Government—the Farm Loan Board. There is no sounder security in the country. There is no agency of the Government which has ever accomplished as much for the farmers of this country. There is no system which has ever been established to meet the needs of agriculture that compares with the farm loan system. They should be able to supply—and no doubt will reach that figure—a million dollars a day to the farmers of the country.

I dislike very much to see any modification or change in the farm loan act. I dislike to have any proposed amendment of that act presented at any time. Of course, I may say that, like all acts of Congress, it could scarcely be said that it was absolutely perfect when it was passed, and as time goes on we may see the need of amendments from time to time as in any general legislation; but I venture to say that there never has been passed by Congress an act which has needed or received as few changes or amendments as has the farm loan act. The Federal reserve act was a splendid, magnificent piece of legislation, and we had supposed that after years and years of study we had passed an almost perfect piece of legislation; but consider the amendments which have been made to the Federal reserve act since it was put upon the statute books, as compared with those which have been offered to the farm loan act. It will be observed that the ratio is 10 or more to 1.

I have not taken the trouble to count them, but I am simply saying that when the farm loan act was passed it was as perfect a piece of legislation, in my judgment, as was ever put upon the statute books; it has accomplished more for agriculture in this country than anything else Congress has ever done, and naturally I feel disposed to question any attempt to amend that act in any respect.

The bill before us proposes certain amendments, and it may be that it is the wisest thing for us to do now, in order to associate with the long-term credit system provided by the farm loan act this short-term credit system, keeping them separate, however, in administration in the Federal land banks and under the Farm Loan Board.

While hesitating to launch upon this new venture and to enter upon these amendments to the farm loan act, I am inclined to favor this legislation as the best that has been offered, it seems to me, to meet what appears to be a real need on the part of the farmers of the country. They ought to have their own financial system, because agriculture is an industry which is not only the basis of all our prosperity and all our well-being, but it is peculiar in that the business is altogether different from that of a merchant or a manufacturer, where they are turning over their goods from day to day, or in 60 or 90 days, inasmuch as the farmer must wait upon the seasons, take all the chances of drought and flood and enemies of plant life, take all the risks, and can not expect to realize from his labor, his work, his toil, until the crop matures and is finally put upon the market.

The farmer needs a different system from that of the merchant or the manufacturer or the business man. He needs altogether a different plan from the commercial plan. He needs a system peculiarly adapted to meet the needs of that particular industry, which is fundamental, and which must be taken care of, because all our prosperity at last must depend upon a sound and healthy agriculture.

I think, therefore, it is advisable to link this plan up with the Farm Loan Board and the farm loan act, rather than with the Federal reserve act and the Federal Reserve Board, which is, after all, a part of our commercial system. I am therefore going to support this bill, although I hesitate even now to favor changes in or amendments to the farm loan act.

Referring to the work of those commissions which I have just mentioned, I had the honor of being the chairman of both of the commissions; and I must say, although I perhaps should not, inasmuch as no one else, I believe, has mentioned it, that, although Congress appropriated some $20,000 to cover the entire expenses of the United States Commission in connection with that work, involving three months of travel and investigation and study in Europe, we actually paid back into the Treasury something like $3,000 of that fund and did not ask Congress for an additional appropriation, which is quite the uniform practice in the Senate, I find. We actually covered the entire expenses for clerks, translators, and everything connected with the commission in that tremendous study and work, and returned to the Treasury a part of the appropriation which had been made to meet our expenses.

On March 13, 1914, that commission submitted to the Sixty-third Congress, second session, Document No. 380, a report in three parts. One of the parts refers to personal or short-time credits, and I beg leave to call attention to some of the things which we stated in that report. I read:

The purpose of credit unions is not to make commercial profits but to give credit to members on favorable terms.

That is based upon a study of credit unions established in European countries and was submitted for consideration because the commissions finally decided that they had better confine themselves to this long-time credit plan as being the primary need of the farmers of the country and not make any recommendation at that time with reference to short-time personal-credit systems. We said:

As generally found throughout Europe this system does not even admit of any distribution of dividends. Where this rule is in complete force all net earnings or profits are carried to the reserve fund or used in the creation of institutions of public utility or are devoted to the common good.

That is at page 28 of the report I am reading. I continue:

A few of the credit unions, however, and particularly those which have a material share capital, provide for the distribution of dividends, but even in these cases rules are very strict, and the dividends never exceed the maximum rate of interest charged the borrower. In Austria the profits are never paid in the form of interest on shares, except in the very rarest cases, being placed in the reserve almost always, although in some cases small amounts are devoted to the common good. The same general rule applies in the case of Italy and other European countries.

The fact that no dividends are paid or that dividends when paid are insignificant does not mean that these credit unions are not prosperous. Taking Germany again as an illustration because of the fact that Germany has literally thousands of these societies, we find that the great majority close their business each year with a respectable fund designated "net earnings." Out of the 12,797 credit unions referred to in the small table presented above 11,793, or more than 92 out of each 100, closed the last fiscal year for which reports are available with net earnings, while only 911, or 7 out of each 100, declared a loss. Ninety institutions closed their business for the year with a balanced sheet, showing neither profit nor loss.

If we take the total result of all these credit unions under consideration the net earnings after subtracting losses amount to not far from $2,000,000 for one year, or almost 30 per cent of the share capital of these institutions; but, as noted above, this is not declared in the form of dividends on the share capital, and, as a matter of fact, when the total working capital is considered, these profits represent only about 0.4 per cent, showing what a narrow margin the institutions consider safe.

We rather thought that there ought to be encouraged in the United States this idea of creating these local credit unions in the various States, and in that way the plan would be worked out for supplying the personal credits, or the credits based on the personal obligations of the borrower in connection with the mortgage or lien upon his personal property, whatever that might be, somewhat after the plan proposed in this bill.

Then, in the summary, at page 29, we said:

A careful examination of the descriptions of these European banks or credit unions suggests the questions: Are these institutions necessary in this country; and if so, should they be provided for by law, or is any legislation necessary?

The members of your commission feel that such institutions are necessary in many, if not all, country communities in the United States. We will not take space or time here to establish this position, believing that it represents the unanimous opinion of farmers and of unbiased or unprejudiced observers acquainted with the problem.

The members of your commission are of the opinion that credit unions could be organized in almost every State in the Union, if not in every State, without specific legislation, as they were organized in many European countries and as they have already been launched in several American States. At the same time it is believed that legislation clearly defining credit unions, their scope, their functions, their methods of operation and limitations, as well as a system of inspection or supervision of these institutions, is eminently desirable.

The members of your commission are agreed that it is clearly within the power of the different States to pass the necessary legislation, and we desire to call the attention of Congress to the specific laws of Massachusetts, New York, Wisconsin, and Texas providing for credit unions within those States.

Then follow certain conclusions and recommendations; for instance:

The minimum capital for banks organized under Federal charter is fixed at $25,000 in the national bank act. The Federal reserve act reenacted this provision in fixing the capitalization for member banks in the new system. It follows, therefore, that the rediscount privilege created by the new law is extended only to banks having a capital equal to that of national banks under the old law.

There are more than 8,000 State and private banks in the United States with a smaller capital than that required by law of member banks in the new system. These banks are located mainly in small country villages and do business either directly or indirectly with farmers. No reorganization of our national banking system can be complete and just to the agricultural interests which deprives or withholds from these small banks participation in the benefits of the Government rate of discount.

In order to be sure of its ground, your commission addressed letters of inquiry to several hundred of these small State and private banks, asking if it was their purpose to increase their capital so as to join the new system; and if not, whether they would join were the capitalization to be reduced to $10,000. The replies were practically unanimous. These banks will not increase their capital, because in most instances a capital of $25,000 is not warranted by the volume of business transacted by them; this minimum is excessive for banks located in thinly settled farming districts. For this reason, then, and not from any spirit of hostility to it, these banks will not enter the new system. The very large majority of those replying stated that with a minimum capital of $10,000 they would reorganize and become member banks of the regional system.

The decision of these country banks renders it certain that without amendment to the national bank act relatively few farmers can become patrons of member banks in the reserve system. Thus the advantage of direct Government rediscount—which is the rational basis of all approved systems of short-time rural credit—will be largely withheld from farmers because of their residence in thinly settled parts of our country. Our rural population is justly entitled to receive credit direct from reserve banks in the same degree that urban population enjoys this advantage; and the method of bank organization should be such that residents of country districts can successfully overcome the disadvantages of their environment.

Your commission is of the opinion that a very few changes in the present banking systems would better adapt large numbers of existing small banks to the needs of great numbers of farmers and farm laborers, and at the same time leave these institutions unimpaired to perform the commercial functions for which they were primarily established.

Considering that was written in March, 1914, it seems to be rather prophetic. I am glad of some effort to induce the smaller State banks to become members of the Federal reserve system. The situation now was cited in the preamble of a resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] yesterday that—

It appears from the last annual report of the Federal Reserve Board that 9,640 State banks and trust companies, constituting over 85 per cent of the eligible State banks and trust companies in the United States, have failed to become members of the Federal reserve system.

The bill offers some inducement in that direction and it may be that more of the banks will join. But I conceive the trouble to be not so much the need of additional member banks in the system as increased activity on the part of those who are members of the system. A great many of the member banks at present do not transact any rediscount business at all. They apparently are not serving the communities in which they now exist. Even the members of the present system seem not inclined to make rediscounts and seem to pride themselves on the fact that they are not discounting any of their paper.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Florida has referred to the fact that there are a large number of State banks and trust companies which as yet have not affiliated with the Federal reserve system, as I understood him. He took the position that he believed it would be advantageous for more of the institutions to which I have referred to become associated with the Federal reserve system. May I ask the Senator what reasons he has for assuming that great advantages would flow from the State banks and State institutions affiliating with the Federal reserve system?

I ask the question particularly in view of the fact that last summer when I was west I encountered a good many bankers in my own and in other States who had not joined the Federal reserve system, who deprecated what they seemed to think was the tendency of the Federal reserve system, namely, to impose so many impediments, restrictions, and obstacles as to separate the people from the banks. That is to say, under the old system they contended that the banker was brought into contact with the people, knew their needs and their wants, could understand the element of the personal equation in making loans, and could make safer and better loans, and could better satisfy the people than could be and has been done by the Federal reserve system. Their contention was that the Federal reserve system made a sort of procrustean bed that tried to establish some system of uniformity, and that the personal equation and the legitimate needs of the people could not be taken into account. Therefore, they insisted that they did not intend to become members of the Federal reserve system.

I would like to have the views of the Senator from Florida upon that criticism.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know there is a sentiment of that sort. They do not care to come under the control of the Federal Reserve Board and have certain restrictions and limitations placed upon them, certain examinations made, requirements as to the kind of paper and securities they may take, and so forth. But the Senator will note that in order that paper may be rediscounted by the Federal reserve banks and circulating notes issued on that paper, it must bear the indorsement of a member bank of the system. Consequently the banks outside of the system have not the facilities that the member banks have for obtaining circulating notes on paper. Hence it is thought to be important that as many banks as possible should acquire the status of members in order that they may have the full rediscount privileges and be entitled to have circulating notes issued on the paper rediscounted for them. That, of course, is a great facility and it must have many advantages. It is upon that theory it is desirable, if possible, to increase the membership of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. KING. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are members of the Federal reserve system who have not availed themselves of the privileges of rediscount?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely, but I think that is a great mistake.

Mr. KING. They are sufficiently strong that they feel they do not need to resort to rediscounting their paper with the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I observed just a moment ago that I thought that there was a real difficulty and weakness in the system, that the member banks themselves were not taking advantage of the facilities in sufficient degree. To my mind, instead of using as a sort of advertisement the fact that they do not need to rediscount their paper and thus bolstering up confidence in them, I think it shows they are neglecting the requirements of their communities.

Mr. KING. The Senator must not forget, however, that the banks of our country to-day have assets of the aggregate value of perhaps $40,000,000,000 to $50,000,000,000. In view of the fact that many of the banks have large deposits and large resources, sufficiently large to meet the legitimate demands of their customers, they feel that there is no necessity of applying, even though they are members of the Federal reserve system, to the central organization for the privileges of rediscount. It seems to me they are wise in adopting that course. They have all of the interest, because they are not paying any part of it to the central organization. They are deriving all of the benefits, all of the profits and advantages that result from the lending of money, and are not compelled to share with the central organization.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, they are not subject to criticism if, as a matter of fact, they are meeting all the needs of their several communities without rediscounting. They ought not to be criticized for not availing themselves of that opportunity under the system. On the contrary, they are to be commended for it. However, I am very much afraid that some of them have the impression that if they can let it be known that they are not rediscounting paper in the Federal reserve bank they are thereby on such a solid foundation and entitled to so much confidence that it can be and is used as a sort of advertisement, which I do not think is the right spirit if their communities really need all the facilities which those banks can afford. If we could increase the membership and spread it out in the Federal reserve system, I think we would make a wider field for the use of the rediscount privileges under the Federal reserve act, and thereby be helpful to agriculture as well as business generally.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator, if he will pardon me further—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The criticism has been made by many economists and many students of our fiscal affairs, agriculturists as well as bankers, that the facilities for credit in the United States perhaps have been too great, the result of which has been that we have become a Nation of debtors as well as a Nation of creditors, with property of the value of perhaps $250,000,000,000 to $300,000,000,000. I am speaking now of the aggregate value of all the property of the United States and all of its nationals. We have an indebtedness—National, State, municipal, and individual—of from $100,000,000,000 to $150,000,000,000. I have attempted to ascertain approximately what was the indebtedness of the character last referred to. The figures differ, but I have not any hesitancy in saying the obligations of the United States, the States, municipalities, and private individuals reach the stupendous figure of more than $100,000,000,000.

Now, with a mortgage of more than one-third of the value of all the property of the United States upon that property it does seem to me we can not complain about not having sufficient credit. I grant in some sections the fountains of credit have been perhaps dried up or have not flowed sufficiently copiously, but, generally speaking, it seems to me we have gone mad upon the question of credit. Instead of seeking economies we have sought to develop new fountains of credit.

I was wondering if the Senator believes that the need of the country now is additional credit, unrestricted credit, or rather the development of markets for the commodities which are produced so abundantly, particularly by the farmer and also by the manufacturer of the United States. We need markets, it seems to me, more than we need anything else, and opportunities for the farmers and the producers of commodities to obtain sufficient credit to enable them in an orderly way to place in the hands of the consumer those commodities which the consumers must have.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, referring to the question of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I will say that, of course, primarily we do need, and probably our greatest need is, the development of markets and marketing facilities and a proper solution of the problem of distribution. There is no question that we must devise some plan for the economical distribution of products. That would be most helpful. At the same time, whereas it may be that we have abundant credit facilities—that is, possibilities of extending credit and therefore possibilities of going into debt—still the matter of interest is very important in that connection.

Our people from time to time have been borrowing a great deal of money, but they have been paying enormous rates of interest. For instance, agriculture for nearly a century past has paid rates of interest which would have meant the destruction of any other industry; no other industry in the world could have survived under the burdens of interest and charges and terms which agriculture has had to bear. The main thing to be gained now is to afford to agriculture that accommodation which it needs to-day upon terms and at a rate of interest which the industry can stand. That is the object we are trying to attain in the passage of the pending legislation.

Referring to the report from which I previously read, at page 32, I will continue to the conclusion of it:

Students of this subject will recognize in these suggestions the elements of the French system of rural banks, which is the latest system to be devised and which has been tested sufficiently by actual experience to prove its efficacy. Happily, these principles adapt themselves very easily to our reserve system, and in our opinion would prove of large benefit to our rural population. We are aware that France supplements the rediscount advantage by the deposit of considerable sums of public moneys in these banks to be loaned exclusively to farmers. The Government of France is also very friendly to the agricultural interests of the nation, and encourages a liberal policy by the Bank of France in extending rediscount privileges to the farm paper held by these small banks. The commission feels justified in assuming that the Federal reserve act will be administered in a similar spirit toward our agricultural interests, and, while making no recommendations to that effect, the commission records its conviction that in some sections of the United States either aid of similar character by our Government will be necessary or founders' shares will have to be purchased by men who are inspired by altruistic motives if personal loans are to be speedily extended to farmers in all sections of the Republic at fair rates of interest.

Banking laws have been unfair to rural industry because farmers have been widely scattered and not in a position to use them, and because no special type of institution has been provided in the past to care for their special needs. As a result these laws have militated against the growth of industrial democracy, and unless supplemented will destroy the fruition of the new freedom to a large part of our industrial population.

Your commission believes that it is also within the power of Congress to pass laws providing for credit unions or cooperative credit associations and making them fiscal agents of the National Government, but the conditions of agriculture differ so widely, the needs of farmers vary so greatly, and the status of the different classes of people in rural communities are so unlike that it is our opinion that such laws where called for can best be enacted by the various State legislatures.

That was the view we held in March, 1914. As I said at the outset, I have all along been impressed with the feeling that if those who are engaged in agriculture would cooperate among themselves—and I have always hoped that the national farm-loan associations would be the nucleus for that sort of cooperation—and then would establish such institutions as they might need, such as the credit unions, under the laws of the different States in the different communities, that would be probably the best way to work out a system of short-time personal credit. However, the cooperative spirit has not seemed to spread very greatly, although its soundness and advantages are being realized especially amongst our people who have to do with marketing agricultural products. Such cooperation is essential in the handling of their products, and cooperative marketing associations have been established and have accomplished a great deal of good; but cooperation in the nature of credit unions it seems has not developed sufficiently to meet the needs. Hence we come now to Congress to provide some sort of plan, and the plan worked out in the bill which is now before us seems to be the best we can offer.

I wish to say just another word with respect to the question of tax exemption of securities. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROTH] yesterday expressed his view that there ought to be an end of the exemption of securities from taxation of any kind of securities; I take it he means whether issued by the States, the Federal Government, or any other agency. The Senator seems to be somewhat inclined to apologize for the provision in the pending bill which proposes to exempt from taxation the debentures which will be issued by the Federal land banks under the proposed act. I make no sort of apology for that. On the contrary, I should not support the measure unless it did carry the provision that such debentures were to be exempt from taxation. I differ from the Senator with regard to the whole subject, as to the proper policy to be pursued by the Government and as to the great loss which it is claimed the Government is suffering in the failure of taxes because, as alleged, the rich are investing their money in tax-exempt securities.

It seems to me the whole basis for that sort of a claim is absolutely wrong. In the first place, the Federal Government is not losing anything, because it never had any right to tax State securities or the securities issued by any subdivision of a State. The Federal Government never undertook to tax its own bonds in all the history of the Government until within a recent time—I think it was in 1916 or 1917—when we began under certain conditions to require the income from certain Government bonds to be taxed. In my judgment it is an unwise proceeding for the Government to issue its bonds and then require that a tax upon those bonds or the income derived therefrom shall be paid to the Government.

Certainly the right of the States to tax their own securities or not to tax them should not in anywise be interfered with by the Federal Government; and I am opposed to any sort of constitutional amendment which would undertake to deprive the States of the right to tax their own securities or exempt their own securities or the securities of any subdivisions of such States. It is a monstrous proposition. We are gradually cutting away all the rights which the States have left.

Some people do not seem to realize the nature of this Government. The Federal Government has only the power that the States have granted to it and such as are necessarily implied therefrom. The States have all the powers reserved to them which have not been granted to the Federal Government and not prohibited by the Constitution to the States. The power to tax is the power to destroy, as Chief Justice Marshall said in McCulloch against Maryland, and now the proposition is embodied in a joint resolution, which recently passed the House and is now before the Finance Committee of the Senate—I do not know what action they will take upon it—to amend the Constitution so that the Federal Government may tax securities issued by the State.

I call attention to the provision of the Constitution:

AMENDMENT X.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Some people keep talking about what the Federal Government is losing because a large amount of money is being invested in securities that are exempt from taxation. The Federal Government is losing what it never had and what it had no right to have. It is a very queer kind of a situation when multimillionaires come forward—such as Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., the Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association of Chicago, and the Wall Street Journal—and advocate this kind of a constitutional amendment. These altruistic, beneficent friends of the poor, downtrodden taxpayers of the country are insisting that they are being robbed under the present plan and that it ought to be changed in order that the rich may contribute their proper share of taxes of the country. Millionaires and multimillionaires demanding that they, the rich, shall be taxed more than they are now taxed; that they shall not be permitted to escape taxation by investing their money in tax-free securities! Whoever heard of those gentlemen insisting that they ought to be taxed more than they are now taxed? Who is preventing them from bearing their share of the taxes? Whoever heard of those friends of the downtrodden proletariat, who are now demanding that the common, every-day taxpayer shall be relieved by their additional contribution to the taxes of the country? That insistence from that source is a suspicious circumstance, it seems to me, that should be considered in connection with the movement to amend the Constitution in order that State securities may be taxed by the Federal Government.

I venture the assertion right here, Mr. President, that this movement, this whole agitation with reference to amending the Constitution and this whole cry against tax-free securities, found its very beginning and inception in the Land Mortgage Bankers' Association—a multimillionaire organization that has grown rich out of the charges it has imposed upon the farmers of the West—because they started out with a proposition to deprive farm-loan bonds of that feature. They knew perfectly well that if the tax-exemption feature was taken out of the act under which farm-loan bonds were issued the rates of interest which the borrower would have to pay for the money obtained from the proceeds of those bonds would be very greatly increased. It is estimated that it would be necessary to fix as to these bonds, or every kind of security that must pay a tax, a rate from 1 to 2 per cent more than the rate they bear if they are tax free; and, consequently, the Land Mortgage Bank Association wanted to increase the rate of interest to the farmers of this country, and thereby somewhere nearly reach the amount of interest which they would charge upon loans obtained through them. They started this whole movement to destroy the tax-exempt feature of farm-loan bonds; and, inasmuch as they could not make headway in that direction as to those bonds, they then spread out and changed their plans and brought to themselves other multimillionaires, and said, "We want to eliminate all this exemption feature as to all securities by States, cities, counties, or other subdivisions, and by the Federal Government."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has the Senator ever considered how much profit might come to these people who already hold tax-exempt bonds if all other issues should be stricken down?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think beyond any question they would profit to the amount of something like a billion dollars. It is estimated that the securities outstanding to-day that are now tax exempt run from ten to eighteen billion dollars. The minute you impose taxes on all future issues, of course, the value of these tax-free securities will at once increase, and I dare say those gentlemen holding them will profit to the amount of nearly $1,000,000,000; but it is perhaps not so much that that is in their mind as that some of them undoubtedly are influenced by the idea that if tax-exempt securities can be taken off the market it will broaden the market for their industrial securities, their railroad bonds, their industrial bonds of every kind and character. The public will absorb just so much; and if you impose taxes upon these securities which are now exempt you will bring them up to the level of the industrial securities, and the industrial securities will undoubtedly enjoy a broader market than they have to-day.

So, in the first place, I am utterly and teetotally opposed to any further inroads being made upon the reserved rights of the States of this country. I have not been as careful about that heretofore, I am afraid, as I am getting to be the longer I am here and the more I see the States being gradually deprived of almost the last vestige of rights and of sovereignty. I am very much indebted to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who sits before me, for some sound doctrine on that subject from time to time declared here, and I have been impressed by his observations, and I feel more than ever the danger point being reached in that regard. The whole foundations of the Government are about to be undermined by repeated efforts being made on every hand and on the slightest pretext with the purpose to disregard and even usurp the rights and the sovereignties of the States and to vest in the central power here full authority over the people and their affairs.

That is the first proposition, and that prompts me in the outset to oppose this movement. In the next place, I do not agree that any increase of revenue of any consequence would come to the Federal Government even if this sort of change is made. It is estimated by experts on the subject, as I have just said, that these tax-free securities sell at par at a rate of interest 1 per cent less than they would sell for if they were not tax free. Very well. Here are people with money. They invest in these tax-free securities. They practically discount their income tax by making that investment to begin with. They say: "I am willing to take 1 per cent less interest on my money where I know it is safe and I have no income tax to pay than I would take if I had to pay an income tax on my investment." Therefore, as I say, they practically pay their income tax when they invest their money in the first instance in tax-free securities.

In the second place, without this tax-exempt feature there are many municipalities, many counties and districts in the United States which would be unable to go on with great public improvements that mean the progress and development of those communities. I had some occasion to say this on that subject on January 12, 1922, and the more I think about it, the more the soundness of it is fastened upon my convictions:

But the arguments offered are challenged for the following reasons:

1. There is no proof that exempt securities, outside of United States bonds, are held in large amounts by men of large incomes. And who can say with certainty that investment by this class of investors in United States bonds is inspired more by a desire to escape taxation than by patriotic motives and safety.

2. Such amendment can not affect outstanding tax-exempt securities, and therefore no increase of Federal revenue can come from outstanding issues.

3. The amendment would deprive States and municipalities from procuring future funds at a low rate of interest, and thus prevent development and progress in the way of essential public improvements.

4. The class of funds which go into tax-exempt securities comes largely from estate and trust funds, for the benefit of widows and orphans, by reason of the fact that the element of speculation—consequent from high interest rates—must be eliminated from such securities, the safety of the principal being the first requisite.

Again, capitalists will not, simply to escape a reasonable income tax, invest in securities paying from 4½ to 6 per cent when they are able to make many times this per cent by investing in some business or enterprise.

I stand by that now.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was just going to ask the Senator to discuss this phase of the question: It is contended that if tax-exempt securities be stricken down, the people will profit. If the securities are taxed, who has to pay the tax?

Mr. FLETCHER. Unquestionably the people who issue the securities.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Government has not a dollar of its own. In other words, the man taxes himself for the privilege of saying that the security is taxed. Is not that it?

Mr. FLETCHER. It comes to that eventually.

Mr. CARAWAY. And it always costs quite a good deal to collect a tax, does it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. It does.

Mr. CARAWAY. The people never get back what they paid.

Mr. FLETCHER. The percentage of cost of collection is growing all the time. The cost of collection, I think, is very much higher to-day than it ever has been before.

Mr. CARAWAY. And that would be a clear loss, would it not, to the people who had to finance their activities?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. In other words, the taxpayers would pay the increased rate of interest and then pay a bureau to go out and get a part of it back. We will take, for instance, as an illustration of that point, these figures: The average of all returns for income taxes in 1920 was $3,270. The amount of capital invested in bonds at 4½ per cent that would yield that income would be $72,666.57. The taxpayer whose income is $3,270 presumably in the first instance would be entitled to the exemption of a head of a family, which would be $2,000. Therefore, he would only pay, say, 4 per cent on $1,270. You see what that would be. Four per cent on $1,270 would be a little over $50. That is the amount of the tax which he would pay, leaving off the cost of collection entirely, assuming that he just comes up and pays it over to the Government, and there is no cost at all, and the Government gets $50 income tax. What do the people pay who issued those bonds? Seven hundred and twenty-six dollars and sixty-six cents—1 per cent more—is the estimate of all the experts. That seems to be quite agreed upon as the difference between what would be paid on tax-exempt securities and what would be paid on those that bear the tax. One per cent on $72,666.67 is $726. In other words, the county or the State which issued those bonds would pay $726, and the Federal Government would get $50. That is the way the thing works out.

Suppose there were no exemption. The income yield to the Government would be $130.80 on this investment of $72,666 in taxable securities, and the taxpayers who issued those bonds would be obliged to pay $726 a year in order that the Government might get $130.80 income. You see how it works out.

In the Daily News of January 16, 1923, this statement is made:

Well, friends, admitting there are two sides to this question, we desire to offer the following facts in extenuation of the principle of tax-exempt municipal and State securities—a principle which seems to lack press agents just now.

If there had been no tax-exempt securities San Francisco would still be in the throes of a corrupt, inefficient, and nerve-wrecking street car monopoly; Los Angeles would be buying water and hydraulic power from a private monopoly, as many less-favored cities are doing; Detroit would have no municipal street railroad; there would be mighty few State or county paved highways, and the electric power of the future would be securely held "in trust" by the first friends of Messrs.—

I need not call any names here, but meaning these multi-millionaires.

The rich lovers of the common folk may be perfectly pure in their protestations, but somehow we are suspicious of the whole Greek gift-bearing outfit.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, right in that connection, in any other respect did you ever hear a rich man howling for the opportunity to pay taxes?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I said awhile ago, that is a most unusual performance, and it is one to excite some suspicion when you consider the influences back of this whole agitation. To bring the matter very close home, and make a definite application of it, I know, for instance, that one of the most progressive and highly developed counties in Florida is Polk County. Beginning in 1916, they issued $1,500,000 of bonds for the purpose of building county-wide asphalt roads. There was another issue by districts in 1917, 1919, 1920, and 1921, a total of $2,540,000 of bonds issued in that county by the whole county and by different districts. Those bonds were all exempt from taxation. The county-wide bonds sold for one-eighth above par. The balance sold for something less than that. All of the proceeds from the sales went to the county, and were expended for the building of hard-surfaced roads in Polk County. The effect of the expenditure of that money on good roads has greatly increased the value of all kinds of property in the county.

The assessed valuation in 1914 was $9,755,090. In 1922 the assessed valuation was $20,516,873, and the increase attributable to the improvements financed by the bond issues is 90 per cent, according to the tax assessor. Unquestionably they could have sold those bonds without the tax-exempt feature, but they would have paid an average of 1 per cent more interest than they pay now, and by the use of those bonds they have increased the assessed value of property in that county in three years from $9,000,000 and something to over $20,000,000. Anyone riding through the county to-day will observe the splendid development taking place in every direction wherever those roads reach, and whereas a few years ago you would ride mile after mile between one home and another home, now when you ride along those beautiful roads it is almost as if you were on the paved streets of a city. Settlement is taking place on both sides of every road everywhere; there are orange groves, vegetable farms, beautiful homes lining these great highways, and the development and progress of the county are almost beyond comprehension. That has been brought about by the issue of bonds and the making of these great public improvements, and I have no doubt it is typical of other counties. I am quite sure it is. I could name other counties in my own State where the same thing is true, and I have no doubt every Senator here can cite cases of that kind.

The proposition is to make the people who have issued these securities for the purpose of these public improvements, and in order to promote the progress and development of their communities, pay an additional 1 per cent interest on those bonds annually until their maturity in order that the Federal Government may lay its hand on the income and derive some little revenue, nowhere approaching the amount of the additional tax that would rest upon the shoulders of the people who issue the securities. So I say that I am utterly against this whole proposition of amending the Constitution in order to accomplish what these gentlemen claim is in their minds, and I am heartily in accord with that feature of this bill which exempts the debentures the Federal land banks are to issue in the same way that farm-loan bonds are exempted. I do not believe the constitutional amendment has any chance of receiving a two-thirds vote in the Senate, and I do not believe it has the ghost of a chance of receiving the ratification of the requisite number of States, but just as sure as that amendment is adopted it will be found that every farm-loan bond hereafter issued will be taxed by the Government, and these debentures will be taxed, and the farmers of this country will be called upon to pay an additional rate of interest over that which now prevails.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask the Senator if he observed with what horror the proponents of the amendment viewed the amendment to strike out the word "hereafter," so as to make all bonds taxable? Did the Senator read the proceedings in the House? They looked upon that as absolutely unconscionable. In other words, they do not want the amendment to reach the people who have all the billions of wealth, and therefore they would not consent to striking out the word "hereafter," so that the tax would rest upon all bonds. They want it merely on bonds issued hereafter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not kept up carefully with the debate in the House, though I have been interested in reading some of it and found it very admirable; but I can well understand what the Senator suggests about it. It means this—and there is no escape from it—that under this constitutional amendment the Federal Government could not tax State securities, unless it taxed farm-loan bonds, and therefore the ultimate result of this thing would be that the farm-loan bonds would be taxed.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was the primary object.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was the primary object, and they are reaching it in a roundabout way instead of directly.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest to the Senator, too, that they undertake to make it appear that the State gets an advantage in having the right to tax Federal securities; but who pays the tax? I would like to ask again, whether the tax is levied on a Federal security or a State security, who pays it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course the taxes must come out of the people.

Mr. CARAWAY. The same people?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the same people.

Mr. CARAWAY. It does not create one dollar of wealth, does it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Therefore it is no extension of a privilege to the citizens.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is undoubtedly right about that. In connection with that subject, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an article by Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, taken from the New York Times of Sunday, January 21, 1923. It is a very clear, fair, and forceful statement.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The New York Times, Sunday, January 21, 1923.]

ARGUMENT FOR TAX-FREE BONDS ANSWER TO PROFESSOR SELIGMAN—RIGHT OF RAISING REVENUE RESERVED WHEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WAS ESTABLISHED—ASSERTS CONTENTION OF ECONOMIST IS BASED ON FALSE PREMISES.

(By Stuyvesant Fish.)

May I be permitted a few words on Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman's article which appeared on Sunday, December 31, 1922, on the first and seventh pages of the New York Times? Under the heading "Menacing, flood of tax-free bonds," he makes a studied plea for the proposal now pending in Congress to further amend the Constitution so as to deprive the several States and their municipalities of their inherent rights to borrow money free of Federal taxation.

Had the Constitution been framed for the purpose of enabling the Federal Government to tax the several States and the people thereof without limit, there might be some cogency in the arguments brought forward by the administration at Washington and elaborated by Professor Seligman. The Constitution was and is a delegation by the several States to the Federal Government of certain powers for certain purposes, as is so clearly set forth in the preamble thereto.

Upon its ratification by the States 10 amendments—our "Bill of Rights"—were adopted defining and limiting the powers of the Federal Government. They end thus:

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

From the beginning to this day that which Mr. Jefferson somewhere refers to as "our agency at Washington" has been so continuously and of late so aggressively usurping to itself the powers reserved by the States to themselves or to the people that we now find even so well read a man as Professor Seligman led into the error of speaking of the "exemption" of State and municipal bonds from Federal taxation. He even goes so far as to speak of Congress as "conferring a special privilege and advantage on the States," and "according a special privilege to the State and local government bonds." Neither he nor any member of the administration can fail to know that the Federal Government lacks all authority to confer or accord privileges or advantages to the States or any of them.

The States and their minor divisions enjoy no exemption whatever, the fact being that they have not given Congress power to tax their bonds or the interest thereon.

The proposition now before Congress is simply an effort by those at Washington to deprive the States, their municipalities, and their people of yet another of their reserved rights, and must be resisted by all who do not want to see a "Frankenstein" created at Washington, which its creators, the States, may later have, for self-preservation, to destroy.

It would require a letter as long as Doctor Seligman's—say, five or six columns in the Times—to review and answer all the sophistries therein set forth. But let us look into some of them.

I.

Under his heading "III" Doctor Seligman figures the Federal, State, and local bonds which he speaks of as "exempt" as amounting to about \$15,000,000,000, and the interest thereon at $\frac{4}{5}$ per cent as \$675,000,000, and then says:

"The Federal Government alone will have lost up to 1926 not only the 8 per cent normal tax, but also the surtax, in so far as these securities are held by the richer individuals."

Like others, the Federal Government has not lost and can not lose that which it never had, namely, the right to tax its own bonds which were issued tax free, and the bonds of States and municipalities which Congress has never had the power to tax in any way. Those seeking for fresh fields for Federal spoliation could readily and might just as logically figure out a vastly larger total in the value of lands and buildings in the United States which Congress can not and does not tax. The real estate in the city of New York alone was last year assessed for $10,249,991,835, and so on through the whole country.

Doctor Seligman then says:

"If we assume that these bonds are so held that they are subject to an average tax of 40 per cent, we have a loss to the Federal Government of \$270,000,000 a year. * * * This makes no allowance for the $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent tax on the bonds held by corporations, which will bring the figure to at least \$300,000,000."

From which he argues that this nonexistent and imaginary loss transcends any possible gain that might accrue to the Federal Government from lower rates of interest on tax-exempt bonds. But where does he get his figure of 40 per cent? The present law requires an income of at least $68,000 for the exaction of a 40 per cent income tax. How misleading his estimate is will be further shown in a moment.

II.

Lower down, under the same heading "III," Doctor Seligman produces figures from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made public a few days ago. Taking his figures we find that the number of returns for income-tax purposes, the amount of revenue collected therefrom, and the average income return to have been as follows:

	Total number of returns.	Total net income.	Average income per return.
1916.....	437,036	$6,298,577,620	$14,412
1917.....	3,472,890	13,652,383,207	3,643
1918.....	4,425,114	15,924,639,355	3,599
1919.....	5,332,760	19,859,491,448	3,724
1920.....	7,259,944	23,735,629,183	3,270

The average income throughout the United States having in 1920 been $3,270 and obviously tending downward, what becomes of Doctor Seligman's assumption that the income from the bonds which he speaks of as exempt "are so held that they are subject to an average tax of 40 per cent"?

In another part of his article, under his head "IV," Doctor Seligman makes a comparison between 4 per cent tax-free bonds and 5 per cent bonds subject to 1 per cent tax, ignoring the fact that under the present law it would require at least a taxable income of $38,000 to yield 25 per cent income tax.

III.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report for 1922 (p. 13), gives as "among the means frequently used to reduce the amounts of income subject to taxation" these four:

1. Deductions of losses on sales of capital assets, with the failure to realize on capital gains;
2. Exchanges of property and securities so as to avoid taxable gains;
3. Tax-exempt securities; and

"4. Other avenues of escape, such as the division of property, the creation of trusts, and the like."

But not so Doctor Seligman.

Under his subheading "How the plan works," he says:

"It is beyond peradventure of doubt that the prodigious falling off implies an immense investment in the tax-exempt securities."

Doctor Seligman must know that with the introduction of a highly complicated, graduated income tax law there sprang up all over the country a class of lawyers who give their undivided attention to advising those capable of paying their fees on making out their tax returns. Apart from this, any very rich man, having been mulcted out of 73 per cent of his income in one year, would naturally look around during the next 12 months to see how he could better his condition: and I incline to think from what those learned in that business have told me that some of the very rich have subdivided their securities among various corporations or trustees. Secretary Mellon's report for 1922 (p. 13) shows that in 1916—

Of incomes of over $300,000 there were returned for taxes
And in 1920.....

$892,972,986
246,354,585

Decrease..... 746,618,401

Assuming that the securities which yielded this difference carried $\frac{4}{5}$ per cent interest, the principal involved would have been \$16,591,520,022. Does Doctor Seligman want us to believe that those having incomes of over \$300,000 have bought up all, indeed more than all, of the \$15,000,000,000 of untaxed bonds?

IV.

Toward the end of his paragraph III Doctor Seligman says that—
"With the growing and imperious needs of the Federal Government we may be compelled to depend again in large measure on the largesses of the States."

Wouldn't it be better to limit the "imperious needs of the Federal Government" and make that concern "cut its coat according to its cloth"? The plain people who do not directly pay taxes are beginning to understand that a great part of the awful burden which they do carry in the excessively high cost of living comes from taxation and maladministration of Government, Federal, State, and municipal.

Throughout Doctor Seligman speaks of the exemption from taxation as "accruing to the rich." Bless his honest soul! Does not every man, rich and poor, try to so manage his affairs as to escape some of the terrible burden which is oppressing us? He must know, as I know, many holders of exempt bonds, so-called, whose return for income tax does not bring them above the normal.

V.

Doctor Seligman's statement under his heading "V" "What is the solution?" gets down to this: He proposes that the Nation shall have the right to subject State and local bonds to the same tax it assesses on its own bonds; the State and local governments shall have the right to subject Federal bonds to the same burdens as they impose on their own bonds, all of which reminds me of the equally "naïf" proposition made in his historically informing book on "The Income Tax" (Macmillan Co., 1911), published while the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution was under consideration. His solution of various difficulties then in view (see page 655) was that "the National Government assess the (income) tax, and let the State and local governments share in the proceeds." Out of all the billions which the Federal Government has taken from the people by way of income tax in the last 10 years, has one cent been restored to any of the States or the citizens thereof?

VI.

Professor Seligman's whole argument is based on the false premise that holders of what he calls exempt bonds escape burdens, which they pass on to others. On the contrary, those who lend to the United States, the States, and their minor divisions, against their tax-free securities, by accepting 4 per cent per annum interest, while they might get 5 on taxable securities (Doctor Seligman's estimate), really pay more than their share, and at the outset agree to pay it for the full life of such securities. To that extent they benefit all other taxpayers.

Should the Constitution be so amended as to prevent the further issue by the States and their municipalities of tax-free securities, the difference between the interest on taxable and nontaxable securities, which Doctor Seligman, I think rightly, figures at 1 per cent per annum, will have to be added to the taxation of every State and municipality throughout this broad land for all time. To us here in New York, where the city has already borrowed so nearly up to if not beyond the legal limit of such borrowing, the change will have relatively small effect on the taxpayer. But our friends in the rural parts of this State and throughout the West and the South, whose growing needs call and will continue to call for fresh borrowings of untold billions, must in their own interest see that this amendment be defeated alike in Congress and in the State legislatures. The maxim that "the power to tax is the power to destroy," must not be forgotten.

As to the contention that by way of income tax there can be collected anything approaching to the difference in interest between a 4 per cent and a 5 per cent bond, let me point to the fact that the Government has never given out any figures showing what is collected as income tax on interest on taxable Government bonds. In letters to the Treasury Department, to Members of Congress, and to the Federal Reserve Board at Washington, and in various other ways, I have been vainly trying to get some light on that subject, ever since the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, first departed from the settled, honest and wise American policy of issuing all obligations of the United States as tax free. The power of Congress to tax is ever unlimited as to amount. That to-day those who hold taxable securities of the United States are not mulcted out of 100 per cent of the interest covenanted in them to be paid is due to the forbearance of Congress and not to its want of power to thus repudiate the whole debt.

The average of all returns for income taxes is yearly decreasing and was, in 1920, \$3,270. Taking Doctor Seligman's rate of yield for State and municipal bonds, $\frac{4}{5}$ per cent, this represents a capital of \$72,666.67. Returns of \$3,270 of income yield the Government \$130.80 per annum. But as he figures that subjecting such securities to taxation will raise the rate of interest to be borne by them by 1 per cent per annum this collection is less than one-fifth of the \$726.67 required to pay the increased interest, not to speak of the cost of collecting. In the collection of internal revenue the per cent of cost of collection has in recent years risen from 0.95 per cent in 1917 to 1.30 per cent in 1922.

I am fully aware that in dealing with the average figures of returns, I am subjecting myself to the retort that under our graduated income tax vastly higher percentages are exacted from the very rich. But Mr. Mellon's reports are eloquent and convincing on the unwisdom of the very "high brackets," as a means of collecting revenue. It is sad to say so, but none the less true, that those who can afford the price of "the advice of counsel" always have and ever will protect their own interests within the law, be it what it may, as against the great mass of the plain people who can't afford the necessary fees.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some time ago, on Sunday, December 31, 1922, there appeared an article in the New York Times by Professor Seligman, and this is a reply to what Professor Seligman had to say. I would not mind putting his article in the RECORD, but it is a very long one, and this perhaps refers to the portions of it which are particularly material and in point. I submit that these propositions laid down by Mr. Fish are absolutely sound, and his argument, it seems to me, in unanswerable. It is in accordance with what I submitted on the subject in January, 1922, and confirms absolutely my conviction that the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution ought to be opposed by every possible means that can be exerted against it.

I close by saying that I am in hearty accord with the provision of the bill which exempts these debentures from all taxation, and I feel that the measure as now submitted is perhaps the best that can be proposed at this time. I believe it can, if properly executed, accomplish a great deal of good and be of immense value to the farmers of the country.

It will depend, after all, on the administration. If the administration is what it ought to be, this plan can be made most effective and valuable. If the administration chooses to hold it back or to neglect it or to delay and indirectly, if not directly, in a way refuse to have it function properly, then it will not accomplish any good, but it will be a failure. But that, of course, we will have to learn from experience. If it is administered as I hope it will be—and I do not mean to imply that I question that it will be well administered under the Farm Loan Board—I think the measure will be of great value.

The Farm Loan Board prefers not to take the responsibility upon itself of administering this system, and there is a little complication about it, it being linked up with the farm loan system, which is altogether based upon mortgages to meet capital needs, and for long time. It is distinct in many ways from that system. There has been an attempt in this bill to keep the operations separate in the Federal land banks, and I hope that can be done. I can see how the Farm Loan Board hesitated a little, even as I hesitated, to amend the farm loan act and take on this additional work and responsibility, but if Congress puts it on the Farm Loan Board, I think they will conscientiously and energetically endeavor to administer it to carry out the purposes and objects of the legislation. I hope that will be the case in any event.

HELENE M. LAYTON.

During Mr. FLETCHER's speech,

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4113) for the relief of Helene M. Layton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 4113. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while technically under the rule the Senator from Delaware could not properly interrupt the Senator from Florida for that purpose, if the bill will excite no discussion, I shall make no objection to its consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state the purposes of the bill, if the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the bill takes no time for consideration, I shall make no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a very short bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. If I shall not lose the floor by doing so, I am perfectly willing to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill (S. 4113) for the relief of Helene M. Layton, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Helene M. Layton, administratrix, cum testamento annexo, of the estate of Lewis W. Mustard, deceased, the sum of $2,852.43 by reason of an overcharge in connection with the estate tax on the above estate arising out of the requirement of the United States Court in China, at Shanghai, China, that the tax be paid by Edward H. Dunning, the executor in China, before the account of said executor could be closed.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to the Senator from Washington—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill if it may be passed at once.

Mr. KING. I hope the bill may be immediately considered and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

After the conclusion of Mr. FLETCHER's speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. McFadden, Mr. Dale, and Mr. Wingo were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ladd in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McLEAN, Mr. PEPPER, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in another body the curtain was rung down yesterday on a great farce. The headlines in the Washington Post of this morning read:

Daugherty cleared by House, 204 to 77.

Permit me again to say that there is a very great difference between the word "cleared" and the word "whitewashed." The words "cleared" and "whitewashed" seem to be used interchangeably. I am not criticizing the House; but it could not "clear" Mr. Daugherty. There are things that even the House of Representatives can not do. It can "whitewash" Mr. Daugherty, and it did it. It was no surprise. Everybody knew it was to be done.

I should not say a word about the matter at all if it were not for the heat with which the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House pursued the witnesses who had the temerity to appear against the Attorney General. He said in effect that if it were not for his kindness of heart he would have another Member of that body [Mr. KELLER] in jail until he talked as he—the chairman—wanted him to talk.

I should like to call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that Mr. KELLER and the chairman of the committee are from the same State. They are members of the same political organization, both being members of that nearly defunct political party called the Republican Party. They both submitted their claims to the people of Minnesota in November, both standing on their records. The chief effect, I understand, that each made in the election was to call attention to what had been his attitude touching the charges against the Attorney General. Mr. KELLER had insisted that charges should be investigated. Mr. VOLSTEAD, as chairman of the committee, had prevented the investigation. When the election was over Mr. KELLER was found to have received the largest majority that he had ever received, and, I understand, the largest majority ever given for a Congressman in that district. Mr. VOLSTEAD received several thousand less than a majority, and will hereafter have that rare experience for him of trying to make a living without being on the Federal pay roll.

Mr. WOODRUFF was also one of the men who had asked for an investigation of the Attorney General and his resolution had gone to the Committee on Rules. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], after the committee had voted out the rule, put it in his pocket and refused to report it to the House, and intimated that the desire to investigate the Attorney General was purely political and cheap politics at that. Mr. WOODRUFF and Mr. CAMPBELL both belong to the same party. Both of them are members of whatever remains of the Republican Party. They each went to their people on the question of whether they had been wise or otherwise in dealing with the question.

Mr. WOODRUFF got every vote cast for Congressman in his district. Mr. CAMPBELL got all but a tremendous majority; he got a small minority. Mr. WOODRUFF will continue to represent his district in Congress; Mr. CAMPBELL will have to find something he can do outside of holding office.

Therefore I say that the committee can not clear the Attorney General. The committee can do what every colored man in my State does in the spring of the year—whitewash. It will not stay on quite as long as the "whitewash" we put on our cabins, but it is composed of the same material.

I am under no obligation to defend a Republican against a Republican. Ordinarily, I think about the only time we might with some confidence accept the statement of a Republican is when he is criticizing another Republican. But I would like to show who Mr. WOODRUFF is, whom the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary on yesterday so contemptuously refused permission even to make a statement. I read from the Congressional Directory:

ROY ORCHARD WOODRUFF, Republican, of Bay City, Mich.; born at Eaton Rapids, Mich., March 14, 1876; educated in the high school at Eaton Rapids and Detroit College of Medicine, Detroit; received the degree of doctor of dental surgery from the latter institution; practiced dentistry for 10 years in Bay City; was elected mayor of Bay City in April, 1911, and was elected to the Sixty-third Congress in November, 1912; served as an enlisted man through the Spanish War with the Thirty-third Michigan Volunteer Infantry; served two years in the World War as an infantry officer, acquiring the rank of major during service in France.

I want to say again that he received every vote in November that was cast for a Member of Congress in his district. The chairman of the Committee on Rules received a truly small minority. What is more remarkable is the fact that on yesterday every Republican who defended the action of the committee in the other body, except one, had been given a commission to stay at home next year.

But these men, whose faith in people has gone since the people have withdrawn their support from them, find themselves now anxious to bow to the powers that be, the powers that can appoint, as we saw yesterday illustrated in the Senate on the street-car fare question. I tried to cure that situation by a resolution which suggested that defeated Members of either House ought not to participate in framing fundamental legislation.

It was said in the paper—and I am talking about that, only incidentally mentioning this other "body" in passing, not in a spirit of criticism, because I have no intention of doing that—that the—

Exoneration of KELLER's charges is complete.

It was said also in the article, following what has been quoted, that there was no evidence to sustain the charges and that witnesses, wherever they were suggested, could not be had. Of course they could not be had when the committee would not hear them.

I am not inclined to waste the time of the Senate in discussing these charges against the Attorney General. I shall merely ask permission to insert in the Record certain letters upon which I wish to comment briefly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The letters are as follows:

Hon. ROY O. WOODRUFF,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WOODRUFF: Before bringing to your attention my memorandum to Col. Guy D. Goff, Acting Attorney General, dated March 13, 1922, and incorporated in your speech to Congress on April 11, I desired to be sure that Hon. H. M. Daugherty, the Attorney General, was personally acquainted with and fully informed as to all matters involved in the situation at the Department of Justice, in order that he might act in the premises if he desired to do so.

I was informed that Col. T. B. Felder was a very close personal friend of Mr. Daugherty, and I was brought in contact with Colonel Felder and explained the situation to him and requested him to call the attention of the Attorney General to the reports that I had filed and to inform him that unless he acted I would pursue the course indicated in the memorandum referred to. The next day I was called to the office of the Attorney General, and he stated to me that he had my reports before him, and I then ascertained that he had been personally acquainted with the situation.

The Attorney General stated to me that he would call me into conference on the following Tuesday, but I heard nothing further from him, and after waiting a sufficient time to give him every opportunity to act, I formally transmitted the matter to you, as is now well known. I might add that I had never known Colonel Felder before meeting him on this occasion and for the purpose stated, and subsequent thereto have only seen him casually until last night.

Yesterday I had a message from Colonel Felder to meet him in his room at the Shoreham Hotel, which I did last night, and in the presence of a witness I engaged with him in an extended discussion of conditions in the Department of Justice, of which I had complained. I stated to him that I had no animus against the Attorney General, but that I felt most bitter against the conditions which he was permitting in the Department of Justice. During the course of the conversation Colonel Felder stated that he had been retained as counsel for the Bosch Magneto Co. and that he desired to associate me with him in the case. He told me that he had been with the Attorney General during the afternoon and had gone into the matter with him fully and that the Attorney General wanted him to see me. He stated that the Attorney General had agreed to cooperate with us and that he had also talked with Col. Guy D. Goff for an hour and a half during the afternoon, and that everything had been arranged for us to proceed.

Before leaving his room in the Shoreham Hotel, Colonel Felder stated that he was going to spend the night with the Attorney General at the Wardman Park Hotel and that they would talk about the matter until 3 o'clock that night. Each time Colonel Felder broached the subject of my employment I shifted the subject, and when we parted he asked me to do nothing in my fight until he could see me next day. When we parted Colonel Felder took a taxi for the Wardman Park Hotel and asked me to join him that far out on my way home, but I declined. This morning I received a letter from Colonel Felder notifying me that I had been retained in the Bosch Magneto case, a copy of which is hereto attached.

While I think it is eminently proper that a suit should be brought to set aside the Bosch Magneto sale, and while under ordinary circumstances I would have had no hesitation in being employed in the case, when Colonel Felder disclosed the fact that he had come to me from the Attorney General and with the arrangements that had been suggested, the impropriety of the proposal I consider reprehensible, and I desire that you be acquainted with the facts.

In order that there may be no misconception of my true position and intentions in the matter in case I am further approached, I am reducing the foregoing statement to writing and will have this letter duly witnessed.

Very truly yours,

H. L. SCAIFE.

SHOREHAM HOTEL, Washington.

DEAR CAPTAIN SCAIFE: Am obliged to return to New York to-night. Sorry I did not see you before my departure. I expect to return on Monday or Tuesday next, when I will complete our tentative arrangements. You may consider yourself retained in the Bosch Magneto case. We will discuss the details on my return.

Very truly yours,

THOS. B. FELDER.

The above letter was undated, but bears postmark of May 5, 1922.

Mr. CARAWAY. Captain Scaife, a man as to whose high character Members on the floor of the Senate have borne testimony, had formerly been an investigator in the Department of Justice under the present Attorney General. Because the Attorney General would not move in some cases where men who had perpetrated great frauds upon the Government and would not prosecute them, Mr. Scaife resigned. He would not be a party to a farce that pretended to prosecute people who had violated the law when in fact there was to be no prosecution of them. So he quit the department.

Thomas B. Felder, whose name, I presume, everybody has forgotten, but who at one time was an attorney in the State of Georgia until Georgia had a house cleaning, when he sought more congenial associates and went to New York, had had some dealings with the Attorney General with reference to procuring a pardon for Charles W. Morse, who was confined in the penitentiary at Atlanta. By the way, he is the same Charles W. Morse for whom the Attorney General had the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] so vehemently deny that he, the Attorney General, when in private practice had had anything to do in procuring a pardon, or that he had ever received a cent in connection with his, the Morse case. Afterwards, when I read his contract with Morse into the Record, which showed not only that he was attorney for Morse but had been paid for his services, or at least paid in part, the Attorney General had the poor grace to turn on his friend and supporter and say that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] had misquoted him. Oh, he used stronger language than that, but I want to be decent about the matter.

But in fact he left the question of veracity between himself and the Senator from Indiana to determine each for himself. I think everybody who knows both of them, however, had no trouble in doing that. We all believed the Senator from Indiana, and necessarily disbelieved the Attorney General, because the Attorney General had given out so many contradictory statements about his connection with this case that his denial came too late to be accepted. However, I am wandering.

Felder came down here, as he had come on many occasions before. Whenever he had a case involving some violation of the Federal statutes, it seems that his practice was to see the Attorney General, and he had very good luck with his clients after that. He came here and, according to his own statement, entered into an agreement that he should become attorney for the stockholders of the old German Bosch Magneto Co. and bring suit against the Federal Government; that he and the Attorney General had agreed in advance upon what should be the result of the trial seems implied. He was required, so he said, to take Captain Scaife in with him. So a man working for the department went to see Captain Scaife and took him to the hotel where Felder was, and Felder there disclosed what he said had been an agreement. This is disclosed in the first letter set out above. He also said that he had been required to take care of Captain Scaife in this case and in some others in order that he might effect the settlement with the Attorney General. In the presence of at least one man representing the department—oh, but I will take that back; a man working for

Mr. Burns, who is at the head of the investigating department for the Attorney General—he suggested that Scaife should be paid $10,000, one-half down and one-half when the case was terminated.

Scaife declined it. He was then offered $12,000 to accept employment in this case. In confirmation of that statement, I desire to say that Mr. Felder was called away to New York that night, and he wrote Captain Scaife a letter. That letter has been in the Record for nearly a year. It has been commented on in both Houses and has never been either explained or denied. Mr. Felder wrote Captain Scaife a letter stating, "Go no further in your fight"—I am not quoting the letter exactly, but I will have the letter reinserted in the Record—"you may consider yourself employed in the Bosch Magneto matter." This is the second letter printed above. It was an attempt to retain him who had been the chief agent investigating the matter on the part of the Government to appear with Mr. Felder against the Government, representing the German stockholders of the German Bosch Magneto Co.

I repeat, that letter was never explained or denied. Having commented upon it, I then received a letter, among many others that Mr. Felder wrote me, in which he said if I would give him a chance he could satisfactorily show that his and the Attorney General's position were compatible, one representing the Government and the other representing the stockholders who were to sue the Government; that it was perfectly legitimate and compatible that they should get together and have him hire away from the Government—the Government's chief investigator—and then the controversy settled. He said also if I were inclined to be critical he would bring his clients—that is, the people who held the stock of the German Bosch Magneto Co.—here and show that the arrangement was perfectly proper. I put that letter in the Record months ago. I repeat, none of these letters has ever been explained and never been denied. All those matters were before the House investigating committee. They knew the witnesses, but not one of them was asked to testify.

If it be true, Mr. President, that the Attorney General of these United States may enter into a conspiracy with a lawyer representing hostile interests to settle a case at a cost to the people of millions of dollars, and that be entirely proper, of course the committee ought to have applied the whitewash brush very heavily. The people, I am sure, do not agree with that view, however. There is not a lawyer, I venture the assertion, before the bar in any State which is represented by a Senator now on this floor who would not have been disbarred had he been guilty of such conduct. The allegation goes unanswered and undenied, and yet the chairman of the committee put in all of his time denouncing those who made the accusations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas permit a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask two questions, so as to save interrupting the Senator again.

First, was Captain Scaife, to whom the Senator has referred, actually in the employ of the Government with the knowledge of the Attorney General at the time Mr. Felder says he was directed by the Attorney General to confer with Mr. Scaife? That is the first question.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; he was not. Let me answer that question. If I left that impression I wish to correct it now. I thought I explained that Scaife had been connected with the Attorney General's office and had grown impatient and resigned. He could not even see the Attorney General, as is disclosed in his letter to WOODRUFF herein presented, until he got Mr. Felder to arrange for him to have an interview.

He could not speak with his own chief until Mr. Felder, who represented hostile interests, made an appointment with the Attorney General so that Captain Scaife might see him. He became disgusted with that situation and left the employ of the Government, and was trying to have Congress call the Attorney General to account for his failure to do his duty. Then Mr. Felder was sent to him, as I have shown, and said, in effect, "Come with me and you will receive $10,000 in this Bosch Magneto case, and will be employed in other cases." The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] knows Captain Scaife, who is a citizen of South Carolina, and the Senator knows whether he is a man of high character and ought to be believed.

Mr. KING. So far as the record shows, did the Attorney General know that Captain Scaife had been making the investigation for the Government and that as a result of his investigation the Government had instituted some suits or was preparing to defend the suit which was about to be instigated against the Government?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. Captain Scaife left the service and wrote a letter to the Attorney General explaining why he was leaving the service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arkansas have any information as to the final result of the case? Were the $2,000,000 paid?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; they never proceeded further. After the whole affair became public the proceedings seemed to have stopped.

I do not care whether it is an impeachable act or not; but a member of the household of the Attorney General, in the presence of two other witnesses, speaking about the question of examining the mail of Representatives and Senators, said to me that he knew the Attorney General had the mail of Representative JOHNSON of South Dakota and Representative WOODRUFF, of Michigan, examined, and that among those who examined it was the negro chauffeur of the Attorney General, who seems to have been converted into a very great detective. He is almost the head of the Secret Service so far as examining into the mail of Congressmen is concerned.

For all these and many other acts the committee pardoned the Attorney General.

There is a court, Mr. President, before whose bar all of us have to go. The Attorney General, his chief, the members of the committee, the Members of the Senate—all of us must go before the bar of public opinion, before the constituencies whom we represent. I am sure that they will appraise accurately the relative merits of the people who are connected with this controversy. I should like to add that wherever they have had the opportunity to speak they have recorded their verdict in favor of the charges and against the whitewash; and that they will continue to mete out to each of us the deserts which we are entitled to receive I have no doubt. Therefore it makes no difference, and it is rather hypercritical to call attention to the fact that the Washington Post in its headlines declares "Daugherty cleared by the House." If the word "cleared" conveys the idea of what the writer of the article understands the word "whitewash" to mean, I have no objection at all.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I have no desire to criticize anyone in connection with the matter. It is not a closed incident, however, because I have lying right on my desk reports and copies of reports that touch very vitally the conduct of the office of the Attorney General. I have photostatic copies of letters which I have hesitated heretofore to publish; but as soon as I have time to arrange them in the order which I desire I may publish and let the public themselves judge as to whether the Attorney General has been "cleared" or "whitewashed."

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not have the opportunity on yesterday of hearing the address of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on the bill now before us. Doubtless he canvassed the points to which I am about to call his attention. May I inquire of the Senator whether there is a unanimous report upon the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. There is not. One member of the committee, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], dissented and submitted a statement of his views.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator whether the Senator from South Dakota was the only member of the committee who dissented from the report of the committee?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no other signature to the views of the minority. I am not myself a member of the committee, and so I really can not answer the Senator's question.

Mr. KING. A page has just handed me the views of the minority, which I have had no opportunity to examine, but I observe on page 2 the heading:

Inadequacy of the Lenroot bill.

Apparently this criticism of the Senator from South Dakota is based upon the proposition as stated in the views of the minority as presented by him that—

No regard is given to the well-known fact (that has again been demonstrated by the War Finance Corporation) that shortage of credit is more acute in certain districts than others, where there is an abundance of local and banking capital, so that only on rare occasions is assistance needed.

May I ask the Senator whether in his opinion there is justification for that criticism; whether or not his bill is a sort of blanket bill that extends exactly the same privileges, no more, no less, to each section regardless of the needs—the greater needs, probably—of some sections as compared with other sections of the country?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that the bill provides for the subscription to the capital stock of $5,000,000 for each one of the 12 existing land banks. The bill provides that one bank may use its funds for the business of another land bank, but it is optional and not compulsory. The bill also has a provision that if in any land-bank district the capital is not sufficient to meet the needs of agriculture, upon application of the Farm Loan Board, approved by the President of the United States, the capital of that bank may be increased another $5,000,000; so the bill is designed to take care of the very situation of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator believes that under the provisions of this bill, if an acute shortage of credits should exist in any of the 12 districts, sufficient elasticity is found in the bill to provide relief for that situation?

Mr. LENROOT. If in one land-bank district there is not a demand for credit, of course that bank naturally, if there is a demand from another land-bank district, will rediscount the paper of the other land bank. If there is a demand for the entire $60,000,000, for instance, or an acute demand in some section, there is a means provided for doubling the capitalization, but I do not know of any way whereby we can go above that unless we simply take further sums out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. KING. The Senator will appreciate the fact that but few Senators are members of the committee reporting this bill, and they did not have the opportunity of hearing the numerous witnesses who testified; and I am told that a number of witnesses did appear before the committee, some of whom are experts of recognized standing in the United States. I regret to say that no Senator, at least on this side of the Chamber, has explained the provisions of this bill; and its defects, if there be any, have not been pointed out. So some of us who have been waiting for light are somewhat in doubt as to the wisdom of this bill and as to whether or not it meets all of the evils which it has been declared have existed in the past and which exist now with reference to the agricultural interests of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator that I occupied two hours of the Senate's time yesterday in explaining this bill. Of course, I understand that the Senator does not criticize anyone. It was his own misfortune if what I said was worth listening to at all and he was not here to listen to it.

Mr. KING. The Senator understands that committees are in session now and were yesterday.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand.

Mr. KING. And many Senators, including myself, were compelled to be absent from the Chamber during the time that the Senator delivered his address.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be glad to answer any questions that the Senator may desire to put.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator thinks that the criticism of the Senator from South Dakota, as I have just directed attention to it, is not sound, and that there is sufficient flexibility to meet any emergency that may arise?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will find, when he goes through the minority report, that the chief criticism of the Senator from South Dakota is that this scheme does not provide money enough for this personal-credit system; and that means, of course, that we must choose between something of this kind and taking four or five hundred million dollars out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that in the discussion of rural credits bills there has been and doubtless is a diversity of opinion as to whether a Government agency should be set up to loan Government money and to furnish newer capital, or whether provision should be made for the creation of proper corporations with private capital under governmental supervision for utilization by the agriculturists of the United States, to obtain necessary credits. May I inquire whether the bill now before us attempts to meet the criticism that I have understood was urged at one time against a measure which the Anderson-Lenroot committee proposed, namely, that it puts the Government into the loaning business or into the banking business? Does it put the Government into the banking business, or does it rather encourage the furnishing of capital by private individuals, under governmental supervision, to meet the needs of agriculture?

Mr. LENROOT. It does put the Government into the banking business not directly but very similarly to our present Federal reserve bank—not member banks but the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. KING. The parent or central bank?

Mr. LENROOT. The central bank. No provision is made for direct loans to farmers or to any other individuals. There has been, as the Senator says, diversity of opinion as to whether the Government should enter this field; but I have not heard from anyone, from the many, many witnesses that were examined both by the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry and by the Banking and Currency Committee, that any plan can be devised whereby the Government does not furnish the initial capital, except possibly in the case of large live-stock interests, which the Capper bill covers, where it is hoped that under that plan the large live-stock interests, having large resources, doing business upon a very large scale, can organize their corporations under Federal supervision and secure the money necessary; but it has not been suggested to the committee by anybody, so far as I know, that that plan can be carried out so as to be utilized by the average small farmer of the United States.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know whether the committee considered the advisability and feasibility of so amending the Federal reserve banking system as to furnish the credits which the bill now before us seeks to supply to the agriculturists of the United States? The Senator will recall that some fiscal experts, some of our economists and students of banking matters, have believed that the Federal reserve system, devised primarily to care for the commercial interests of the United States, might be so expanded and modified as to furnish needed credits, credits which might be denominated commercial credits, in contradistinction to land credits, to the farmers and stock growers; that it could be expanded so that the paper of the farmers could be rediscounted and loans extended for a period of one year. Does the Senator know whether or not the committee or the commission with which he was associated in this investigation considered the feasibility of amending the Federal reserve law so that adequate credits of the character to which I have just referred might be furnished agriculturists?

Mr. LENROOT. I will answer the Senator by saying that this bill, as did the Capper bill, has a provision extending from six months to nine months the eligibility for rediscount of agricultural paper. With reference to that extension, I will say that the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, which made its report more than a year ago, after a very exhaustive investigation, did not at that time make any recommendation that that paper be extended beyond six months. The commission took that action because of the fact that it was advised by the Federal Reserve Board and by bankers generally that the resources of the Federal reserve system were so largely loaned out, and there was such demand, that there was great necessity of keeping the resources as liquid as possible; and of course the Senator understands that this whole question of the term of paper is dependent upon the liquidity of it. We often hear it said that this class or that class furnish so much of the deposits, and therefore they are entitled to long-time loans. Of course, the first duty of any bank is to protect its depositors; and that is the reason, as the Senator well knows, why long-term paper generally is not feasible—because it can not be realized upon. Conditions have changed during the last year, however, so that now bankers generally and the Federal Reserve Board feel that that eligibility can be safely extended to nine months, but I do not think there is any opinion that it will be safe to extend it beyond nine months.

Mr. KING. Even a limited quantity of paper?

Mr. LENROOT. This bill and the Capper bill, too, limit it in this sense: Having in mind an emergency where it might be necessary to limit it, the power and the duty are given to fix the amount of such nine months' paper or over six months' paper upon a percentage of the assets of the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I also call attention to the fact that the Lenroot bill proposes an amendment to the Federal reserve act which reduces somewhat the capital required by State banks and makes the system more inviting in that way to some of them. There are over 9,000 eligible State banks that have not come into the system. That amendment is, I think, in the Lenroot bill and the Capper bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Both of them; they are identical. I may say to the Senator from Utah, with reference to the amendments to the Federal reserve bank law found in this bill, that with one exception, which relates solely to land banks, they will be made the same as they were in the Capper bill, because an agreement was reached in the committee as to what should be done; and so they were put in both bills with the idea that the first bill that goes through will contain these provisions amending the Federal reserve system, and they will be eliminated from the one that is behind.

Mr. KING. I observe on page 3 of the minority report submitted by the Senator from South Dakota, under the head "Establishment of separate agencies," what appears to be a criticism of this bill because a separate organization was not provided similar to the War Finance Corporation. May I ask the Senator whether that question was brought to the attention of the committee and whether emphasis was laid upon the proposition that there ought to be two agencies; that an organization devoted to dealing with land and the extension of credits upon land mortgages might not, by its training and its disposition toward the entire subject of credits, have the right slant, the right point of view, in dealing with paper of farmers, paper which might be denominated "commercial," in contradistinction to mortgages upon real estate?

Mr. LENROOT. That was very fully considered by both the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry and the Committee on Banking and Currency. One very prominent farm organization of this country favors entirely separate agencies if that could be brought about. There are two objections to a separate agency. I think it was Secretary Wallace who stated that a difference of 1 per cent in the interest rate paid by the farmer was equal to a 20 per cent reduction in his freight rates. If we establish entirely independent agencies, the cost, which, of course, is very large in gross, must either be paid by the farmers or come out of the Federal Treasury; and I do not think the Senator would maintain that, outside of the central organization, such as the Federal Reserve Board or the Farm Loan Board, the Federal Treasury should be charged with all the administration of a personal credit system. That ought to be carried by those who receive the benefit of it.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. We thought, and we were firmly convinced, that we could get a lower rate of interest for the farmer by having this system a department in an existing agency, and thus save all the overhead of an extra organization; and, in addition to that, it would take a year, in all probability, to establish and organize a separate agency, while this could be put into effect and operation almost immediately.

Mr. KING. This bill, then, utilizes existing organizations—

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; it does.

Mr. KING. And empowers them to extend credits to farmers under the conditions named in the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I would be very glad to state, in a word, just what it does in that respect.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. LENROOT. The bill sets up in each one of the 12 land banks a farm-credits department, with an initial capital of $5,000,000 for each, provided by the United States Government. The credits department is managed by the present board of directors so long as the temporary board of directors shall be in control, but if a permanent organization shall go into effect, wherever the permanent board of directors shall control the affairs of the organization, the credit side shall be managed by the district directors only, or, in other words, those appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. The assets and liabilities of the credits department are entirely separate and apart from the existing system, and it simply runs as a separate department, with the same general officers, but it is, of course, expected that a competent manager would be appointed for each department in each land bank.

Mr. KING. Would dividends, if any are declared, be segregated? Are there two kinds of stock in the bank?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; the stockholders of the farm loan bank, as it now exists, will have nothing to do with this part of the business.

Mr. KING. Then if losses should result in the administration of the provisions of this bill, the existing farm banks can not be affected?

Mr. LENROOT. They would not be affected in any way.

Mr. KING. Or the dividends affected?

Mr. LENROOT. No. That is expressly provided in the bill.

Mr. KING. Is there provision for two characters of stock and two kinds of stockholders?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Government is the only stockholder.

Mr. KING. The Government is the only stockholder under this system?

Mr. LENROOT. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Is there any provision under which at any time the Government may cease to be a stockholder and the stock be acquired either by the agriculturists who borrow, or by any other agency, or any individual or corporation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; there is not, and I very frankly say to the Senator that at various times during the consideration of this measure the joint commission had that subject under consideration. After the fullest inquiry, this being not a profit-making institution—and if it is to serve the farmer, it must not be a profit-making institution—we could not find any feasible way to apply the present farm-loan system to this system, because there would not be subscriptions to the stock. This contemplates the principal benefit to the farmer through the medium of the banks, State and National, whether they are members of the Federal reserve system or not, but provision is made in the bill for the discount of paper of credit companies or corporations such as the Capper bill provides, so that if a bank is unwilling to serve its customers as it should there will be another means by which access can be had to this system. But banks are not going to subscribe to the stock of the Federal land banks for the privilege of doing that, and farm-loan associations are not feasible, as I think the Senator will see in a moment, because it would not be good business to allow 5 per cent subscriptions to the capital stock and then allow a farmer twenty times the amount of his subscription on his personal note, with no other security. Of course, so far as the land bank is concerned, we have the security of the real estate in every case, so there is a very clear distinction between the farm-loan association system as applied to real estate and any possible association as applied to a personal credit system.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, the United States is authorized to subscribe a primary capital of $5,000,000 for the farm credits department, and that then is permitted to build up a surplus, and from the time when it amounts to $2,000,000, thereby providing a new going capital, 25 per cent in additional surplus goes to liquidate the original capital advanced by the United States, and the capital itself is being built up by three-fourths of the added surplus from time to time as it may be earned. Is that correct?

Mr. LENROOT. That is correct, and, as the bill now reads, until the capital furnished by the Government is reduced to $1,000,000. I stated yesterday I would be willing to support an amendment that would still further reduce it, so that it would be only a nominal sum held by the Government.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if he does not think there is some incongruity in engrafting upon an organization now in existence, which was created for the purpose of making real estate loans to farmers, and which provides for the ultimate absorption by the farmers of the stock, and the elimination of the Government as a stockholder from the organization, an organization such as is created by this bill, which embarks upon an entirely different enterprise, different in the sense that this makes provision for short-time credits and the other long-time credits upon real estate, and which retains the Government perpetually as the only stockholder?

Mr. LENROOT. Let me correct the Senator in one particular. The present law does not contemplate the Government being eliminated entirely at any time from the present farm loan bank system. All the present law does is to provide that when the subscriptions by borrowers are equal to the subscriptions of the Government, the permanent organization provided by the law shall go into effect and the Government stock be retired; but at all times the Government will have one-third of the board of directors.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is speaking of a farm loan act, and not this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Not this bill. The Senator from Utah asked if it was not incongruous. Under the proposed system the Government will have three directors all the time, and the bill provides that the three directors, who shall always be there representing the Government, shall manage the credit department.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me—

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. It is provided that the Government maximum for the 12 banks may reach $160,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. One hundred and twenty million dollars.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; $120,000,000. There are 12 banks, and the provision is for $10,000,000 each. After it gets to be a going concern, a certain percentage is set aside from the profits for a sinking fund, until that shall reach $1,000,000. That means that the Government is still to be the only stockholder in this credit department, but deriving its money from a different source than from the initial subscription?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. The first coming from the Treasury and the other coming from the profits which accrue?

Mr. LENROOT. The Government's management will be the same, however, whether its stock is retired or not.

Mr. SMITH. This bill proposes that as the volume of business increases, if the institution should be a success, no limit shall be placed upon the amount of bonds or obligations which may be issued in furtherance of the accommodations to be extended?

Mr. LENROOT. Ten times the amount of the capital.

Mr. SMITH. And the ultimate capital is fixed at $10,000,000 for each one of the Federal land banks?

Mr. LENROOT. It is fixed at $5,000,000 initially.

Mr. SMITH. But $10,000,000 ultimately?

Mr. LENROOT. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. That would then give something like $1,000,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. LENROOT. One billion three hundred and twenty million dollars.

Mr. SMITH. That would be the entire amount available from all sources for carrying on the farm industries of the country. That source of credit it also supplemented by a slight liberalizing of the Federal reserve law as it now stands?

Mr. LENROOT. A very substantial liberalizing, as applied to this system.

Mr. SMITH. I shall not take occasion this afternoon, Mr. President, to go into this matter as fully as I intend to before the pending bill shall be disposed of. I have been considerably confused as to why there should be any hesitancy on the part of the Congress to extend to agriculture the same access to all the credits available under the Federal reserve act that it has extended to commerce. All of us know that the substitution of the Federal reserve act for the old banking and currency act was to furnish the people of this country with a flexible system of currency, safe in its basis of redemption, but also capable of meeting the expanding and contracting conditions which are incident to all business. Hence there was incorporated into this bill perhaps the one distinctive feature, namely, the power to issue upon the wealth of the country, put in the proper commercial form, a temporary form of currency, known as Federal reserve notes. They are clearing-house certificates. That is what they really are. We make our Federal reserve system the clearing house for the wealth of the country and, upon that wealth being put in proper form, there may be issued from time to time, upon these commodities as collateral, a certain form of credit known as Federal reserve notes.

Of course, the inertia of habit and the power of custom and the disasters which have overtaken us in the form of panics from time to time had made the banking world stand near the shore. Hence they insisted upon and demanded a short-time credit in the very best gilt-edge form. Ninety days was about the extent to which they felt safe to invest the available liquid currency of the country, even a per cent of it, for fear that something might occur and a panic would be precipitated, because the money supply might be tied up in 90-day paper, and before the 90 days should have expired disaster would have befallen them. We thought we had obviated the possibility of the recurrence of a panic by providing that the wealth of the country when in commercial form should be the basis of the issuance of this temporary form of credit.

I do not recall a time since the enactment of the law when the gold reserve was not amply sufficient to justify a further expansion of the circulating medium, the temporary medium, at any given time. The gold held in the country that was available for reserve certainly reached a most stupendous, colossal amount above the required reserve during the very time when the country was suffering most from lack of credit. I think I am correct when I say that I was informed by the Comptroller of the Currency that at one time in 1921 we had perhaps in excess of $1,500,000,000 of free gold, gold against which there was not a single obligation, gold against which there was not a single reserve note. That $1,500,000,000 of free gold in the country would have become something like three or four times the basis of credit on safe commodities plus the gold. It was not extended. I shall not take the time this evening to give my opinion as to why it was not extended.

What I want to say, with these few preliminary remarks, is that what the banking world has been afraid of under the old system was not a basis of fear under the new system. Under the old system the amount of currency that could be put into circulation was as rigid and as unchangeable as the value of gold. It was absolutely fixed. So that a tying up of an appreciable amount of it in what they termed long-time paper left us really in serious danger of a famine. It is not so under the provisions of the new system. We may have under it, as we have heretofore experienced, a commodity panic, but I defy any Senator upon the floor to say that it is remotely possible, if indeed at all possible, that we should have a money panic under the present system.

As long as the country produces the marvelous wealth that it does produce, as long as national and international trade shall exist at all, we can not have a money panic under the Federal reserve system. Of course, under the policy of the governors or the managers we could have a commodity panic. We may deny credit, but the basis of unlimited circulation, practically speaking, is always in the hands of those who are managing our system. I think that would go without a challenge from anyone on this floor.

Now, that being true, why are we afraid to provide in our law that agriculture shall have a credit rediscount or a credit—leaving out the term "rediscount" so confusing to the ordinary lay mind—a credit of 12 months as against ordinary commercial transactions of 30, 60, and 90 days? That was largely the product of the old system. It would not be necessary under the present system. The liquidity of paper is based upon the rapidity with which the ordinary business is transacted. No producer and no manufacturer wants to hoard up his manufactured goods when, by a rapid turnover of his capital within 12 months, he would make in the aggregate turnover more than he would if he were to pyramid his manufactures and raise the price. He would run too many risks and it would be too doubtful. But as long as he can, with a reasonable per cent of profit, turn over his holdings rapidly, he would prefer the 30-day sale to anything like pyramiding. I say that is generally true of the manufacturers of the country.

Under our standardized system, or, I should say, under the standardization of commerce, the perfection which it has reached came about naturally. Under our wonderful systems of communication, transportation, and manufacture we have almost approximated an ideal condition of standardization, not only nationally but internationally. I dare say the manufacturers of this country know to-day almost every 10 minutes practically the consumptive potentiality of every consuming spot in the civilized world. They know where and when and how they can turn over their manufactured articles and get a per cent which, if turned over rapidly in the aggregate, would grant them a large return. We say we accommodate him with 30-day paper, that is one character of manufacturer; another with 60-day paper, that is another character; and another with 90-day paper, or somewhat the same with some little exigencies he desires to meet. But I maintain that even that arbitrary limitation of prime commercial paper under the new Federal reserve system is not necessary. It was necessary under the old system to safeguard against tying up the limited available circulating medium. It is not necessary under the present system, because the very commodity that we produce is in itself, under the genius of the Federal reserve system, capable of liquefying itself under the proper policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Not only that, but it is really a money-making process for the Federal reserve system.

If that be true, and I maintain that I have given a brief outline of the difference between the present system and the old system, why do we hesitate at all to extend 12 months' time of credit to agriculture? I maintain that under section 16 of the Federal reserve act, without jeopardizing a single dollar necessary for ample accommodation of commerce, we could accommodate agriculture for 12 months.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH. With pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. What the Senator from South Carolina has said has very considerable force, because in reality commodities, under the modern system of banking, are substituted for gold.

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. OWEN. Forty per cent of gold is maintained, and then the commodity notes come in with 100 per cent commodities and 100 per cent of increased credit behind them in the Federal reserve system. So that, speaking apart from any other consideration, the securities would appear to be abundant. Since the securities are nonperishable, since they are marketable, since they are put in storage and are covered by warehouse receipts, they themselves comprise as stable a form of security as gold itself, because they are convertible into gold upon the necessity arising.

The old system under which bankers thought that 30-day notes were more valuable than 60-day notes, and that 60-day notes were more valuable than 90-day notes, existed because they had no means by which they could get currency in case of a sudden demand. But now that currency is abundantly provided to expand in accordance with the needs of commerce, that requirement is abundantly met by the system itself, and the argument upon which the old theory was based that a 30-day note was better than a 60-day note has disappeared. I think it merely becomes a question of policy as to whether or not the credits should be extended so long a time that men might be induced to hoard commodities for a rise in value or something of the kind which can be controlled easily by the supervising powers conducting either one of the sets of banks.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad to have the position I have taken endorsed by such an authority as the Senator from Oklahoma. He has put in another form the exact idea that I had. He suggests that we should not so extend the time of discount as to invite hoarding. I think it goes without saying, or I think I have made clear—certainly clear to my own mind—that there are very few manufacturers who would desire to hoard if the market would absorb their turnovers as rapidly as they within reason produce.

Mr. President, I challenge any Senator to stand on this floor and state a reason why under the present commodity basis of credit we may not amend the Federal reserve law, since it has been tried and now found to be so splendidly workable, and extend credit to agriculture for 12 months rather than for 6 or 9 months. The Senator from Oklahoma very rightfully calls attention to the danger that might arise by extending too long a time upon certain paper, which would invite hoarding; but the Senator will agree with me when I state that though a period of 30 days is ample for certain forms of artificial production in this country, 60 days for other forms, and 90 days for still other forms, with no limit whatever upon their access to the credit facilities of the country, yet agriculture, which requires 12 months for the production of its products in the great laboratory of nature, is given but 6 months as the limit for paper which may be used as the basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes, and a 9-month limit is denied.

Mr. McLEAN. Under the pending bill 9-month paper is eligible for rediscount if it is secured.

Mr. SMITH. I had overlooked that. The Senator from Connecticut now states that under the pending bill 9-month paper is eligible for rediscount under the proposed amendment of the Federal reserve act for the application of the issuance of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. LENROOT. If secured.

Mr. SMITH. If secured. Mr. President, that is conceding something. The fact is, it is an extension of three months beyond what I had at first a right or any ground to hope for. However, why restrict the period to nine months?

It takes the average agriculturist 12 months to produce for the manufacturing and consuming world the subsequent 12 months' supply. I can not understand why there should be given to a manufacturer all the time he requires to produce his commodities and to dispose of them under the operation of natural law and deny the agriculturist the same right, when the power of the law could accommodate him just as readily as it accommodates the manufacturer without jeopardizing the credit of the country one iota. Why do we desire under the flexible system of our present Federal reserve act to restrict agriculture? When the wheat crop is made and put in an elevator, properly stored and properly insured, it is then ready for distribution over the next 12 months. Why not grant to the producer of that commodity, who by the law of nature has to take 12 months in order to produce a 12 months' supply, a credit based upon his commodity and give the Federal reserve system the power to issue a sufficient amount of Federal reserve notes guaranteed by that commodity so as to enable him to distribute it through sale over the 12 months, as it took him 12 months' time in order to produce it?

I myself, farmer as I am, should hesitate to say that we ought to grant the rediscount privilege to 12 months' paper on an agricultural commodity if the amount of circulation that could be issued were limited and restricted; but there is no such limitation; the only limitation is the wealth which agriculture can produce. It is like a cork on water—when the water rises the cork rises, and when the water recedes the cork recedes. With the volume of agriculture expanding, why come in here with little bits and chunks and chips and special little subterfuges for the farmer? Why not open the door to the ample credit provided under the present Federal reserve system and give the farmer the same access to the issuance of Federal reserve notes and the credit of the country as is given to others?

The farmer makes the basis of all our credit; and as the farmer increases the number of his cattle and the quantity of his wheat and of his wool and his cotton, the basis of the issuance of Federal reserve notes increases; so the farmer is producing the very basis upon which circulating medium shall be furnished to the country. Ample provision has been made under the 30 and 60 and 90 day issues of Federal reserve notes for those who convert the farmer's raw material into the finished product. By the same token, why should the farmer be denied accommodation for the time during which nature has provided in which he must dispose of his production, if he disposes of it profitably?

Why is a six months' limitation suggested? It is said, "We are afraid to tie things up"; but nothing is tied up, because the very commodity in the warehouses and in the elevators is the basic substitute for gold, for the issuance of credit to enable the farmer to dispose of his products in 12 months.

Let us be more specific and get right down to the real issue involved. A manufacturer in order to complete a certain form of transaction needs but 30 days. He has been amply provided for; all the credit of America is placed at his disposal on 30-day paper. Another manufacturer will require 60 days, and he has been amply provided for with unlimited credit and access to every member bank and trust company of the reserve system, which is as wide as is the credit of America. So has the manufacturer who needs accommodation for 90 days been provided for. Bear in mind that we had 30-day, 60-day, and 90-day paper, because previous to the passage of the Federal reserve act we had a fixed and limited amount of circulating medium. Under this bill the commodity itself—the volume and value of it—becomes the basis of the issuance of currency known as Federal reserve notes. In the case of the farmer it requires 12 months for him to produce; he labors for 12 months; he assumes liabilities for 12 months; and then within 30 days the accumulated fruits of 12 months are realized in the form of a crop that is harvested. It takes 12 months to dispose of that crop. Somebody must finance it. The Government has come royally to the support of commerce and has provided ample facilities in order that it may take advantage of the flexible features of the Federal reserve system; and yet it denies to agriculture the right to liquefy its assets, which it took 12 months to produce, and refuses to give to agriculture an opportunity to distribute the marketing of its product over the 12 months, for 12 months is the growing period of its product, and 12 months is its marketing period, as contradistinguished from the 30, 60, and 90 days. I maintain that it is an insult and a reflection on the agricultural and live-stock raising interests of this country that we stand here and stultify ourselves by denying them the use of the very principle in the bill that safeguards every penny of credit that might be extended while we pour out an unlimited volume to others.

I do not wish anybody to misunderstand the position I am taking. I am not inveighing against manufacturing and commerce; I am merely saying that we have provided ample means of credit of which they may take advantage in the shape of a splendid and flexible financial system, but for some inscrutable reason the door has been shut in the face of agriculture. Why? What danger would there be if we should write into the Federal reserve act a provision to the effect that the officers of a member bank in the system might apply to the Federal reserve bank for the issuance of Federal reserve notes for 12 months' time, based upon commodities in the warehouses and elevators of this country in which are stored farm commodities produced in the preceding 12 months' period, and thus give these producers credit and time sufficient to market their products? No one supposes that the farmer would attempt to pile crop upon crop, for he knows that when the day of sale comes the world can only consume a 12 months' supply. What he would do would be this: He would upon this credit thus extended to him be the financier of his own crop and sell it as his judgment dictated and not be forced to liquidate by virtue of the burden of debt incurred in its production.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber and did not hear all of the remarks of the Senator. May I inquire whether his position is not this: That the Federal reserve system may be so amended and expanded as to furnish a basis for credit to farmers commensurate to that which is furnished to the manufacturing and commercial interests of the United States?

Mr. SMITH. Let me restate my position to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I am interested, though, in knowing whether the Senator thinks we ought to create more agencies or give the present agency greater power.

Mr. SMITH. This body and the one at the other end of the Capitol should take the present system and provide unchangeably and unmistakably that agriculture shall have equal access to the credit facilities of this country on the same footing as other industries, so that its peculiar needs may be accommodated as those of commerce have been accommodated.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator; but what I am trying to get at is: Does the Senator think that can or can not be done under the Federal reserve system by amending it?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly. I started to say we hardly need to amend it; but we ought to take away certain discretion that is now unfortunately exercised by those who have it in charge. I state without fear of contradiction that the five members of the present Federal Reserve Board could in 24 hours relieve agriculture and furnish it all the credit it needs safely and without jeopardizing a dollar, and do it at rates of interest that would make the country blossom like the rose.

Have we forgotten that the basis of the Federal reserve notes is the wealth of the country and that the volume of Federal reserve notes that can be issued is only measured by the production and actual wealth of the country? Then, why furnish ample facilities to one part of the producing and commercial element and deny them to another, when they could be granted to the other without jeopardizing a dollar or restricting the currency? Aye, there is the rub; it would not restrict the currency or the amount available for other people, but when the needs of agriculture shall be met by the temporary loan of the Federal reserve notes the volume will be increased and the lending of somebody else's money will be jeopardized. There is the rub.

The time is not far distant when the people of this country, understanding the principle of the Federal reserve system, will rise up and put it into operation, if they have to clean the stable from the house down. It is here, it is in the Federal reserve act, amply safeguarded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's contention, as I understand, is that the Federal reserve act does not need amendment, but does need different administration?

Mr. SMITH. I do make that contention in a way. I do not wish to put it exactly in that form, but I will say I do in a way; but we need to extend to agriculture the time that agriculture needs, which is at least 12 months. I said before the Senator came into the Chamber that the limitation of 30, 60, and 90 day paper was brought over from the old system, when we had but a very small volume of currency and no way to get any more. It was as restricted and rigid as the eternal law of gravitation; but when we passed this law we made the possible volume of currency in the form of Federal reserve notes as great as the volume of wealth produced in this country—no greater, but as great as that. Now, if agriculture produces its pro rata, under certain conditions, that bill would meet it if you and I understood it and had the courage to demand it. Thirty, sixty, and ninety day paper, as I said, was only arbitrarily prescribed because under the old laws of 1864 and 1870 they were afraid to give any longer time, for fear the majority of the currency might be tied up in 90-day paper and some fellow might corner the market and produce a panic. A panic can not be produced now. I defy any man to say that under the Federal reserve system a panic can be produced.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If I get the Senator's position—and I have talked with him privately about it a good many times, as he knows, and I think I understand what his views are—but to get it down to a concrete proposition there are two things we ought to do with the Federal reserve system in the Senator's estimation—to give ample relief to agriculture as well as to business. One of those is to have men in charge who have the right viewpoint, and the other is to amend the law so that the limitation that is now in the law will be extended to at least 12 months.

Mr. SMITH. Surely; that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. That will give a complete remedy.

Mr. SMITH. That is right. Now, just let me explain this to the Senator, because I may be a thousand miles away, but if I am my mental limitations are such that when I helped in part to frame this law, when I wrote part of one of the sections with my own pen at my own desk, I was delighted with the idea that we had at last, through the composite brain effort of loyal, patriotic citizens, cut the Gordian knot and turned the people loose; and how had we done it? In place of having a simple metallic basis for the issuance of currency, and no other, we had substituted a commodity basis for temporary currency, known as Federal reserve notes, to be extended for what length of time? For the length of time that ordinary business said was necessary between the time of production and the normal time of distribution and consumption. Then the amount of notes that had been issued to you for your accommodation during the period when you desired to market your stuff would be returned and a like amount canceled, so that as rapidly as the volume of the wealth was converted into consumption or passed into actual use the amount of Federal reserve notes was reduced by that amount.

That meant that if I went to the Federal reserve bank and through the application of the Federal reserve agent there was issued to me upon a commodity $1,000, when I sold that commodity for $1,000, or whatever margin I realized beyond that figure, and went to my bank and took up my note which secured the issuance of the Federal reserve notes for $1,000 there were canceled $1,000 of Federal reserve notes; so that the 30, 60, and 90 day paper is no longer a necessity in the ordinary transaction of business, because of the fact that the wealth in the process of consumption and use is represented by clearing-house certificates known as Federal reserve notes.

Now, I ask you this question: If a certain form of business which can turn over its affairs in 30 days comes and asks for a 30-day credit, covering the time in which the man buys his raw material, converts it into finished products, and sells it, we accommodate him. We open every avenue of credit in this country and turn him loose in it. We do the same for 60-day paper and the same for 90-day paper. We say: "We must have these short-time, quick, convertible assets," because we are afraid of what? We can not have a panic now—we could before—as a result of tying up our currency in long-time paper. We can not now, because as long as wealth is here, under the law we can issue a liquefying circulating medium to represent it, and we are on a commodity basis now as against a metallic basis before.

Now agriculture comes along and says: "Why, that is fine. It takes me 12 months to produce. I do not sell some along, but it takes me 12 months to get all my production ready for market. In that commodity I have a 12 months' supply for the next 12 months. It will take me 12 months to sell it. It takes this manufacturer 30 days, that one 60 days, and this one 90 days, but it takes me 12 months. Now, it is not going to jeopardize the volume of your currency a bit; it will increase it. I ask for the issuance of Federal reserve notes to me for 12 months to liquefy my production, as you give the other fellow 30, 60, and 90 days."

That is all there is to it. And whom have you hurt? I have produced the actual basis upon which the law says you can issue this temporary credit. The manufacturer simply converts it. I produce it; and yet the man who calls his wealth actually into existence where it did not exist before is discriminated against in favor of the man who simply changes the form of the wealth.

Instead of coming in here with an expedient such as the Capper bill—of course, if we can not get anything else we must take some crumbs that fall from our master's table—I maintain here this afternoon that we ought to sweep into the wastebasket every one of these subterfuges and write in three years for live stock and one year for agricultural commodities produced in the field and give them the same liberal advancement of Federal reserve notes or credit that we do the others.

What are we quibbling about here? Is it possible that those who have the volume of wealth, as evidenced by a hearing before a committee of which I am a member, in the oil business—God help us!—where fortune after fortune is piled up until it staggers the imagination, the men who furnish my tractors with the gasoline on which they run, the men who furnish the fuel for the trucks that carry in part the commerce of this country, shall have an unholy dividend and return while we, who feed and clothe and shoe the world, must come here on bended knees and beg for a crumb that falls from our master's table? It is a disgrace to the American Senate. It is a reflection on those who would stop us at the door of our opportunity. It is an everlasting reflection on those who put their hands on this flexible, splendid system, and distorted it to the sacrifice of American agriculture.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I was simply going to observe that in the matter of letting credit by the banks of the country they loan credit to a borrower who comes in seeking credit, and they manufacture credit by taking his note as a good security and entering a deposit and giving him a deposit slip. They create, then and there, a credit. The credits which are established under the Federal reserve act are safeguarded by that act with actual commodity values, merchantable and nonperishable. That act, by doing this, has converted merchantable, nonperishable commodities into valid credits, and therefore has increased the power of America as a creditor nation by building up credits on a gigantic scale, so that the resources of the banks, which were only about twenty-five billions when this system was established, are now over fifty-six billions, because credits have been created through a recognition of the merchantable value of commodities in transit. When these commodities are recognized as a proper basis of credit and when credits are issued against them they appear as deposits, and they may be loaned back and forth; and as long as they remain upon that basis of stability they are sound—just as sound as if they were based upon gold—because these merchantable, nonperishable commodities are convertible into gold at will.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator a question right there? The very moment that those who have the administration of this law begin to create a doubt in the minds of the people as to their willingness to recognize it as a basis of credit and to extend the credit, they destroy its credit basis and its market value and produce just what we went through in 1920-21.

Mr. OWEN. There is no question about the destructive effect upon the value of commodities when you deny credits, because you can constrict credits and thereby prevent the purchase of these commodities, you can constrict credits and thereby prevent the production of these commodities, and you can constrict credits and prevent the transportation and exchange of these commodities, all of these factors going to break down the value in the markets of these commodities themselves; and, therefore, striking at the very toproot of credit, you break down confidence in the country.

Mr. SMITH. And striking at the very genius of the present law.

Mr. OWEN. It strikes at the spirit and purpose of the Federal reserve act, which was intended to give stability to credits and not to be used as an agency by which credits could be impaired and broken down.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I had not intended to say even this much this afternoon. I wanted my constituents and my colleagues here to understand that before we do this thing we ought to be fully advised as to what we are doing. Before we place the devoted agricultural interests of this country in the attitude of mendicants in their own home, in the attitude of beggars at the door of their own production and wealth, we had better understand what we are doing.

I do not believe that the educated agriculturists—and they are all more or less educated now—will longer stand this condition under which they are suffering.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this fact, which perhaps we are overlooking; we are in a brand new world and do not know it. We are in entirely brand new circumstances and do not know it. We are in an age as divorced from every other as if we were in another world, and it seems as if our stupidity is forcing us to legislate for conditions which have passed and gone forever, and which our legislation will not fit.

Mr. KING. The Senator has in mind the fact that we are now a creditor nation, have most of the gold of the world, and that the rest of the world is in economic chaos.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; that is one of the conditions, and another is this, that your grandfather and mine, if they were fortunate enough to get a college or a university education, found the training of their logical faculties devoted largely to a very scanty knowledge of philosophy, Greek, and Latin, and physics in a very crude form.

Mr. OWEN. The rule of three and the pons asinorum.

Mr. SMITH. They were attempting to train the mind of a young man in Greek, not that he expected to use Greek in his everyday affairs as Greek, but those who were doing the training knew that that was a language which expressed thought, a beautiful language, and that certain variable forms of words in a sentence determined the kind of a sentence it was, and they did not get the meaning unless their minds were so trained as to understand the logical relation of one word to another, and then they interpreted it and got the meaning. The young man did not use the Greek out in life, he forgot it; but the logical habit of his mind stood him in good stead in the conflict of life.

What about to-day? The most ignorant negro who works in a garage is coming in contact with the logical relation of facts more powerful and potent than ever a Greek accent or a Greek form, because if he puts together certain factors the engine runs; if he does not, it does not run. Even though he may not read and write, he is being educated logically more powerfully than were our grandfathers who studied Greek.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is true.

Mr. SMITH. In every department of our life science has established a practical university and made the veriest laborer a beneficiary of logical reasoning. That would be enough to advance us materially beyond our forebears, but in practically every State there is compulsory education.

As I have said before, knowledge of figures and letters no more constitutes education than fruit jars constitute fruit. Real education is the power to think logically, reasonably, and consecutively, and the even step of science with the unfolding of education has given the power to learn the forms in which education may be preserved, as well as giving the substance of it in practical illustration, and from the lowest hut to the highest castle we have unequaled opportunity for real education, and you will not hold the man in bondage by juggling words over a Federal reserve act. That is what I have come to. It can not be done. I am not here holding any brief for anything except the good old democratic doctrine, clear-cut and contradistinguished from socialism or communism, that each man under the law has an opportunity as God has invested in him, and not as somebody happens to invest in the Standard Oil Co. or in a national bank; that every door of opportunity shall not be shut, because a certain percentage must be made by the capitalists regardless of whether or not agriculture falters and dies.

That is the plea I am making, and I have not come here with some wild-eyed scheme. I hailed the advent of the Federal reserve system as the liberation of the toiling masses of this country, by making it possible for credit to be extended to the producers of wealth, those entitled to it, and not distorting the policy so that its wonderful power and flexibility makes a money panic impossible, but makes a commodity panic imminent. Those who own the banks may go on and do this thing, but they are piling up wrath against the day of judgment.

As I sat and listened to those enormous, staggering figures of profits made out of one of the ordinary necessities of modern organized life, I thought how foolish those men were. Are they going to force us to choose between two evils, the concentration and control of the necessities of life by the greedy individual, or control by the Government? It is not the people clamoring for Government control; it is these everlasting profiteers and greedy men, who are laying such burdens on the people that we are driven to either pay tribute to them in unholy amounts or turn the industries over to the Government and risk our chances with that policy.

If they are wise in their day and generation, they will be perfectly satisfied with a reasonable return, which we want them to make, and would like to encourage; but these colossal fortunes are piled up, and you and I are denied even the very credits provided for, and are told to come in at some back or side door, or, perhaps, we are told, "We will let you have $5,000,000 under certain good conditions, providing you go through a bank, and then through that bank to a trust company, then through that trust company to another one, and shed some of the money as you go. If you open your mouth, sir, you are ruined."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in drawing the alternative between Government ownership and private ownership as a means of correcting this evil, unless these gentlemen who have been drawing extraordinary profits are willing to take a reasonable profit, I think perhaps the Senator overlooks the power and the ability, and perhaps the duty, of the Government of the United States and the State governments, to say to those who are exercising monopolistic powers that they shall be content with a reasonable profit, and to provide the mechanism by which to restrain them, leaving the ownership in private hands, but protecting the public by a reasonable allowance of profit to those who are conducting these enterprises which control the necessities of life.

Mr. SMITH. We have not been very successful with that process. It seems as if the enactment of every law for the control of human greed is seized upon by the nimble wits of those men in the employ of those making inordinate profits to be turned into a breastwork behind which they are then immune from the law. Witness the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will pardon me, the Sherman antitrust law proceeded upon the theory that a monopoly was a public enemy, and that a monopoly ought to be treated as a criminal. That has never been successfully carried out as a matter of fact. In Germany, where they use the cartel system, they recognize monopolies as having been constructed under modern conditions, and they insist upon a fair charge to the public, which will give a fair reward to capital and safety to capital, while protecting the public. We never have really established that system in America, or anything which compares with it.

Mr. SMITH. That is true. That distinction ought to be made whenever we are discussing the Sherman antitrust law, because the distinction between the German form under the cartel and the American form was that the German form allowed the individual to go on but restricted the return he might make, while here in America we look upon a combination as a criminal thing, when it may not be.

Mr. OWEN. In the comment of Mr. Rowe on the testimony given by Mr. Stewart of the Indiana Standard Oil Co., he called attention to a computation made by him that $100 invested in that company some 10 or 12 years ago was now worth $37,000, because of dividends, and then dividends upon dividends, until the investment multiplied itself. Whether that computation is accurate or not I do not pretend to know, I am merely calling attention to it, and to what Mr. Stewart himself said in the public press immediately afterwards. I will not attempt to give his words, but the substance of what he said was that the time had come in this country when capital must recognize the rights of other people; the rights of those who labor, the rights of the consumers; otherwise that it was laying up a day of wrath for itself, just as the Senator suggests.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, apropos of what was said by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] in referring to the cartel system in Germany, I would like to have the RECORD show that notwithstanding the cartel system, which did attempt to restrict profits, the Thyssen group and other groups have accumulated stupendous fortunes, perhaps as fabulous and as colossal as those which have been accumulated by the Standard Oil and other corporations and individuals in the United States. How they have done it I am not quite able to state, but it is a fact that Hugo Stinnes, for instance, accumulated, before the war and since the war, a fortune perhaps larger, in proportion to the wealth of Germany, than the fortune of any man in the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that under the cartel system, under which a reasonable profit is charged, those who handle any commodity find that there is an enormously increased consumption of that commodity, because it is sold to the people at a fair rate, and therefore while their percentage of profit on the turnover may not be very large, the volume of their business being greatly expanded, they make as much money that way as they would in any other; but they do it by rendering service to the country, and not by interfering with production, and by preventing people from being able to get the necessities of life except by paying two or three or four hundred per cent. They really make a surplus under that system which the public can afford to pay them.

Mr. KING. I do not doubt that what the Senator has said is accurate. I am merely calling attention to the fact that even under the cartel system of Germany the accumulation of large fortunes has been permitted. The huge turnover and the profits derived in the packing business is an example in the United States. The enormous turnover, notwithstanding a very small amount is made upon that turnover, in part, it is said, accounts for the huge fortunes which have been made by those interested in the packing business.

Mr. SMITH. I think perhaps I shall have occasion to say something more on this subject before the pending bill shall pass. I honestly confess that I feel humiliated, as a Member of the United States Senate, that I have to be forced to be a party protesting against the humiliating spectacle, to which we have been subjected for the last two or three years, of trying to get some roundabout way to serve the basic industry of this country. It is a reflection, if not a disgrace, upon every Senator sitting upon this floor that we have not fearlessly fixed this splendid system so that it would serve the purpose for which it was created.

Why, Mr. President, to show how there gets to be a habit of thought in reference to the man in the sticks, we provided under the rehabilitation of the War Finance Corporation that agriculture should have 12 months' credit through its cooperative societies. Senators will remember the fight we had as to whether the War Finance Corporation should cater to the individuals, or should cater to the individuals through a bank and through their cooperative society. At that stage of development I stood for the cooperative plan. There is a form of contract now existing with reference to the cotton cooperative marketing association, providing that the farmer must dispose of one-eighth or an average of one-eighth of his holdings each month, which means that he must dispose of all of it within eight months, when the law was supposed to give him 12 months. What better advertisement for the exploitation of the poor fellow whose cotton constitutes that pool than to serve notice on the public that each month one-eighth must go on the market? It is compulsory. What better advertisement would we want to put his head in the halter than that?

Now, I propose, unless that contract is modified, to offer an amendment to the War Finance Corporation act, providing that the cooperative society deriving financial loans from the War Finance Corporation shall have the right to sell in such quantities and at such times as they see fit within the 12 months. Of course it would be the duty of the War Finance Corporation to watch the trend of the market or to make loans upon such a margin as that they would be secure. Surely the net is spread in vain in the face of the bird. If we are going no further than we have, and if we compel him to sell one-eighth of his crop each month, he will be certain to have the prices so fixed that it will not be disposed of for his benefit.

Mr. President, I must apologize to the Senate for the length of time I have taken. I hope I have contributed something to clarify the situation, and I shall again speak upon the subject before the bill becomes a law.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there is one item in the bill which I can not approve, although I would like to say that I regard the bill itself as a distinct step forward. I regard it as providing a number of exceedingly useful features, and while it might be accomplished in some other way I am grateful for the opportunity of participating in passing a measure which I believe will be of service to the country, although I do not think it meets the conditions as fully as it is highly desirable they should be met. If there were proper time and occasion, I think it could be very much improved. I think that the granting of the primary credits, for instance, of $5,000,000 to each of the banks and the establishment of a farm-credits department are very useful and valuable features, and I give it full-hearted approval both as to the purpose and as to the belief that it will serve a very useful end.

I have always thought of the reserve act, however, as an act intended for public rather than private purposes, as an act which ought to give stability to credits rather than to be used to destabilize credits; that the banks were not intended to be money-making banks, but that the capital which was furnished by the members of the system in the form of the reserve should be content with a reasonable profit upon the reserve. But they already, in the short time since the banks were established, have earned 100 per cent. That has been employed as a surplus and has been passed into the capital as a part of the earnings of the bank. That has already been accomplished. Six per cent interest has been earned besides, which has been paid to the banks, I believe, without exception. I have not recently examined the figures, but I think that has been done without exception.

Mr. McLEAN. May I say to the Senator that the Dallas bank has not earned a surplus of 100 per cent?

Mr. OWEN. It has not?

Mr. McLEAN. No.

Mr. OWEN. I did not intend to say that the banks had all earned 100 per cent. They had all earned 6 per cent and I thought nearly all of them had earned 100 per cent which had gone to surplus.

Some time ago the Congress provided that the banks should be content with 6 per cent earnings, but I observe that a 3 per cent additional earning has been given in the pending bill, on the theory that the banks, I suppose, ought to have a larger return.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be very glad to know what the theory is.

Mr. LENROOT. The only theory or purpose of that was to give an inducement or incentive to the smaller State banks which have not come in to come into the system. There was no other purpose than that. There are, I believe, some 9,000 State banks not yet members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. OWEN. Most of those State banks make their terms for accommodation through some national bank with which they are affiliated in one way or another, and while they do not pay directly to the system, I take it that the national banks which extend accommodation in the matter of existing rates see to it that they get their compensation from that source. Many of the State banks, I know, put their deposits with the national banks, and the national banks, out of their deposits thus obtained, expand the deposits in the reserve system.

Mr. LENROOT. It is true a great deal is done in that way, yet I think the Senator will agree that it would be very desirable to get the small State banks directly into the reserve system.

Mr. OWEN. I think it would be desirable to have them come in. All the great State banks and great State trust companies, of course, are in the system now. The Senator undoubtedly is referring to the little banks with small capital.

Mr. LENROOT. I am; and they are the ones who are primarily serving the agricultural needs.

Mr. OWEN. Those small banks have not come in to any great extent. But the provision to which I have referred gives a charge of 3 per cent additional upon the entire capital which is invested, which includes, I take it, the surplus which has already been accumulated of 100 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. OWEN. It means in reality more than 9 per cent upon the capital which is invested in the bank, so that the 3 per cent in reality represents twice that amount.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that 9 per cent is, however, below the average earnings of the banks of the country. We felt that it was important to invite the eligible State banks into the system and also to prevent banks which are already in the system from going out, as some of them are doing.

Mr. OWEN. I am very sure, although I have not seen the figures recently, that there can not be any substantial loss of membership in the system.

Mr. McLEAN. Nothing very substantial.

Mr. OWEN. Only enough for argument, perhaps.

Mr. McLEAN. One or two banks within the last two or three months.

Mr. OWEN. There must have been some particular reason why they left, and not because they were not receiving the additional 3 per cent on their ownership.

Mr. McLEAN. Probably that is so, but 9 per cent is below the average, which did not seem to the committee to be unreasonable.

Mr. OWEN. Six per cent is regarded by all the States of the Union, nearly without exception, except where the element of insurance enters into the question of the loan, as being a fair rate to earn.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; a fair rate, but we are talking about profits now.

Mr. OWEN. I am talking about profits, too. This is an investment in the stock of the reserve banks which already has been doubled by the earnings in a few short years.

The reason why I call attention to the purpose of the Federal reserve act being to stabilize credits is because we saw that an inflation period took place. That was unavoidable because of the war, but it was not restrained as it might have been if we had had a sufficiently extended period of experience in handling the reserve system. We permitted an inflation period to go on, and we found that that went to an extreme, so that when the reaction of prices took place immediately following the war in 1919 and 1920, we reversed that policy rather suddenly and the consequence was we made an industrial depression more severe than otherwise it would have been. But if we hold out the idea of using the banks for the purpose of making profits, I think it would have a tendency on the part of those who are controlling the banks to extend credits for that purpose in order to earn profits, which I do not think ought to be done. I do not believe any credit should be extended by the banks except where it is essential to protect our industrial life and our commerce, because they are the reserve of business. They are not like the ordinary bank capital.

Mr. LENROOT. I am entirely in agreement with the Senator upon that point. It is just a question of whether the benefits to be gained by getting the small State banks into the system are sufficient to warrant the increase in the rate of dividends.

Mr. OWEN. I do not believe the State banks who are now not coming into the system would be led in by an increase of 3 per cent in the amount of interest they would get on what they might hold. For instance, let us take a bank with $10,000 capital and with, perhaps, $50,000 of deposits. Such a bank, putting in a reserve of 10 per cent, would have—

Mr. LENROOT. But a bank with $10,000 capital would not be eligible.

Mr. OWEN. Under the system it would be increased to $25,000, I believe?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. Then, take such a bank of $25,000 capital, with $150,000 deposits. Nine per cent of that would be about $13,000, and 3 per cent on $13,000 would be really a very small amount. I do not think it would be sufficient to induce the small banks to come into the system. When we come to take that out of the commerce of the country on the gigantic amount which is already in, it is imposing a tax upon the commerce of the country for the favor of the banks at large that does not justify the purpose in view. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think that would be reflected in the discount rate?

Mr. OWEN. I was not speaking of the discount rate.

Mr. McLEAN. That is where they get their profits. Does the Senator think an additional 3 per cent on the capital—

Mr. OWEN. I was only speaking of 3 per cent on the investment of a $25,000-capital bank. It would be a very limited amount that they would get from it.

Mr. LENROOT. The profit comes out of the discount rate.

Mr. OWEN. But the Senator was speaking of inducing them to come into the system by giving them this additional rate. I am pointing out that it would be so small that I doubt if it would accomplish the end in view.

Mr. LENROOT. On the other side the query comes, Would the inducement of a 3 per cent rate influence the bank to give a lower rate of discount than it otherwise would for the purpose of making additional profits? I am frank to say I do not consider that vital.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think it is important to the bill at all. I think it might be very readily augmented. I am making this comment on it now because I know that the farmers of the country feel that the banks are already taxing commerce beyond the point of endurance. I, of course, have a very sympathetic relationship with the banks themselves. I established the first bank that Oklahoma had. I am still a director of it. I have been a stockholder in it and I am still interested in the banks from that end. But I do not believe it is a wise thing to put such a provision in the bill. A similar provision, in substance, has already passed in the Capper bill.

I merely wanted to express my dissent. That amounts to about all I wish to do, yet I would move, in order to modify the dissent, to strike out in section 7, page 13, in lines 16, 17, and 18, the words "when net earnings exceed 12 per cent an extra dividend of not to exceed 3 per cent may be distributed to stockholders, and" so that it would read:

And thereafter the remaining net earnings, if any, shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax.

I offer that as an amendment and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table for the present. I shall bring it up later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, a few days ago my friend, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], who, I observe, is now in his seat, made a statement concerning appointments in the Post Office Department. It was very interesting, but I felt sure at the time that the Senator was somewhat mistaken as to the facts so far as they related to the State which I in part represent. I immediately called upon the Post Office Department and asked them for a statement of the facts touching appointments showing the percentage of appointees who had been taken from the highest on the list, and so forth. I ask unanimous consent to have that statement from the Postmaster General printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1923.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your request on the 19th instant, I am furnishing certain data regarding the appointment of postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes from March 4, 1921, to and including January 20, 1923.

The total number of appointments was 9,465. Of these appointments, 1,353 were promotions from the service, 276 of those promoted being women and 6 ex-service men; there were also 1,126 women appointed from eligible registers, 1,250 ex-service men appointed from eligible registers; and of the total number of 7,493 appointments from eligible registers 4,166 were the first on the register. Four hundred and fifty appointments were made where no eligibles were secured, 98 of these being women and 5 ex-service men. One hundred and sixty-nine appointments were made where examinations were not held, which included reappointments, appointments in the Territories of the United States, etc., 51 of these being women.

The total number of appointments in the State of Ohio was 336. Of these appointments 40 were promotions from the service, 11 of those promoted being women. There were also 34 women appointed from eligible registers, 46 ex-service men appointed from eligible registers, 142 were first on the register. Ten appointments were made where no eligibles were secured, one of these being a woman. Five appointments were made where examinations were not held, which included reappointments, etc.

In this connection my attention has been called to statements regarding the appointment of postmasters at Gainesboro and Rutherford, Tenn.

Regarding the appointment of a postmaster at Gainesboro, the records show that only one eligible was certified as a result of an examination for postmaster at this office. In view of this fact the department recommended the promotion of Mr. Joseph M. Dudney, a rural carrier at Gainesboro since September 1, 1907, his record being clear. As the Civil Service Commission reported that he was eligible for promotion, his nomination was submitted to the Senate on December 20.

Regarding the post office at Rutherford, Tenn., the records show that as a result of an examination held on August 13, 1921, the following were certified as the highest three eligibles:

William W. Taylor (preference).
Lowell C. Rickman (preference).
Terrence A. Bone (preference).

Subsequently the Civil Service Commission requested that the papers of the examination in this case be returned to that office for review. After reviewing the papers in the case the commission advised that all of the ratings previously given had been changed, and submitted a revised register, as follows:

Mrs. Claris E. Akin.
William W. Taylor (preference).
Lowell C. Rickman (preference).

Mr. Lowell C. Rickman withdrew his candidacy in a telegram dated March 27, 1922, making Terrence A. Bone third on the register.

Mrs. Claris E. Akin, the first eligible, was nominated on April 31, 1922, but failed of confirmation, and she was appointed acting postmaster, effective July 17, 1922. Again on November 23, 1922, Mrs. Akin's name was submitted to the Senate, but was rejected by that body on December 4 last.

The question of the appointment of some other person as postmaster at this office is now receiving consideration by the department.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in reference to the statement presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], I wish to call attention to a statement that was made here by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day in reference to the appointment of postmasters through civil-service examination, in which, as I recall, the Senator from Nebraska said that both parties had violated the civil-service rules.

Just before the last administration went out of power the then Postmaster General sent out a letter in order to ascertain the political affiliations of postmasters who had been appointed under civil-service rules during the Wilson administration. Some time ago the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] placed in the RECORD a statement which shows that substantially about 45 per cent of all the postmasters appointed under the civil-service rules under the Wilson administration were Republicans and about 55 per cent were Democrats. That included, of course, the 11 Southern States, where a very large preponderance of Democratic postmasters were appointed. Not counting those 11 States, in the remainder of the country a majority of the postmasters appointed were Republicans in their party affiliations. I should like to have printed in the RECORD, so that it may appear in connection with the statement which has been printed at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the statement to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF INFORMATION,
POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
February 26, 1921.

Since the President's order of March 31, 1917, applying the non-partisan civil-service test to the selection of presidential postmasters, appointments to these offices have gone to the candidate first on the list of eligibles furnished by the Civil Service Commission, and the Post Office Department has had no record indicating the political affiliations of the several successful candidates.

The assertion has frequently been made that this order has not been conscientiously administered. To show whether this charge is true and to ascertain just how the application of the civil-service principle has operated in eliminating partisanship and establishing service as the standard of fitness for appointment, the following letter was, on February 12, 1921, addressed to postmasters who have been appointed under this system:

"On March 31, 1917, the President issued an Executive order whereby appointments to presidential post offices were made as the result of an open competitive examination, the result thereof being certified by the Civil Service Commission to the Postmaster General, who submitted to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment, unless it was established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualified him for appointment.

"In accordance with this order you were appointed postmaster, the appointment being based solely on merit, as shown by the result of the examination. It is now claimed by some that in making these appointments the department has shown discrimination for political reasons. The department is without knowledge of the political affiliations of those appointed under the Executive order, as politics was not considered. It will be to the interest of the service to demonstrate that there has been an impartial administration of this order. As all appointments have been submitted to the Senate, it can not affect the selection or appointment of anyone, and in order to enable the department to answer this charge, which is unfounded, you will state in the space below your political affiliations.

"It is not desired to know how you voted in any particular election or whether you voted for any particular candidate, but the party with which you usually affiliate."

There have been three points of attack upon the Post Office Department in an effort to discredit the sincerity of the President's order applying the civil-service principle to the appointment of residential postmasters. This disposes of the last of these attacks.

The first allegation was that the eligible having the highest standing was set aside and some one of lower standing appointed where party politics could be served by the attack. This charge was disposed of by citation of the record, which showed that of 1,560 appointments then made 1,454 had gone to persons whose names appeared first on the eligible list submitted by the Civil Service Commission, and that where the first eligibles were not appointed it was because of their death, declination, or some disability.

The next false accusation was that the Post Office Department failed to recognize the preference given to ex-service men under the law. In response to a resolution of the Senate on this subject the Postmaster General submitted a list showing the names of applicants for these offices who passed successfully the examination held by the Civil Service Commission. Applicants certified to the commission as entitled to preference on account of military service having been nominated to the Senate for confirmation, the department appointed either first eligibles or gave the preference over first eligibles to veterans according to the demands of the best interest of the service.

The Postmaster General's reply to this resolution gives a list of 218 nominations sent to the Senate, but not confirmed, who were entitled to preference for military service, 90 of the nominees not being the highest eligibles. There is also given a list of 49 who for sufficient reasons were not given preference over the higher eligibles, some having declined or withdrawn their applications, some disqualified by age, some being canceled by the Civil Service Commission, and some for some other disqualifying cause.

The records show statistically that there has been no political bias in making appointments under the President's order of March 31, 1917; that the first eligible has invariably been appointed unless disqualified, and that preference has been given to eligibles with military service except where this could not be done without injury to the service.

Replies have been received from 2,103 postmasters to the letter above set forth, which, of course, removes beyond cavil the question of their party affiliation. These replies cover every State in the Union and show that, including all sections, 1,012 appointees were Democrats, 907 were Republicans, 32 were Independents, 10 were Prohibitionists, 3 were Socialists, 129 had no affiliation, and 10 failed to state their affiliation.

Omitting the 11 Southern States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia—overwhelmingly Democratic in their population—the equation stands 598 Democrats, 846 Republicans, 28 Independents, 9 Prohibitionists, 3 Socialists, 95 without affiliation, 9 blank, and 6 dead.

Even in the 11 almost solidly Democratic States a considerable number of Republicans received appointment as postmasters under the application of this civil-service order. In Alabama 6 Republicans were appointed postmasters, in Arkansas 5, in Florida 7, in Georgia 6, in Kentucky 5, in Louisiana 4, in Mississippi 1, in North Carolina 9, in South Carolina 2, in Texas 11, and in Virginia 5.

In States where the population is more evenly divided between the two great political parties, the appointment of Republicans frequently preponderated. In California, 33 Republicans and 14 Democrats were appointed; in Colorado, 10 Republicans and 15 Democrats; in Connecticut, 10 Republicans and 5 Democrats; in Delaware, 1 Republican and 2 Democrats; in Idaho, 11 Republicans and 5 Democrats; in Illinois, 62 Republicans and 33 Democrats; in Indiana, 19 Republicans and 29 Democrats; in Iowa, 63 Republicans and 19 Democrats; in Kansas, 29 Republicans and 20 Democrats; in Maine, 18 Republicans and 10 Democrats; in Maryland, 4 Republicans and 10 Democrats; in Massachusetts, 20 Republicans and 6 Democrats; in Michigan, 46 Republicans and 16 Democrats; in Minnesota, 55 Republicans and 15 Democrats; in Missouri, 18 Republicans and 54 Democrats; in Montana, 25 Republicans and 10 Democrats; in Nebraska, 55 Republicans and 21 Democrats; in Nevada, 2 Republicans and 1 Democrat; in New Hampshire, 7 Republicans and 4 Democrats; in New Jersey, 21 Republicans and 11 Democrats; in New Mexico, 3 Republicans and 7 Democrats; in New York, 40 Republicans and 36 Democrats; in North Dakota, 26 Republicans and 16 Democrats; in Ohio, 34 Republicans and 29 Democrats; in Oklahoma, 26 Republicans and 61 Democrats; in Oregon, 11 Republicans and 5 Democrats; in Pennsylvania, 55 Republicans and 37 Democrats; in Rhode Island, 1 Democrat; in South Dakota, 27 Republicans and 18 Democrats; in Tennessee, 8 Republicans and 24 Democrats; in Utah, 4 Republicans and 4 Democrats; in Vermont, 3 Republicans and 3 Democrats; in Washington, 23 Republicans and 10 Democrats; in West Virginia, 10 Republicans and 31 Democrats; in Wisconsin, 54 Republicans and 7 Democrats; and in Wyoming, 10 Republicans and 3 Democrats.

One Prohibitionist, 1 Socialist, and 1 having no affiliation were appointed from California. One Prohibitionist and 1 of no affiliation were appointed from Idaho. In Illinois there were 1 Independent, 1 Prohibitionist, and 7 of no affiliation. In Iowa there were 2 Independents, 1 Prohibitionist, and 9 of no affiliation. In Kansas, 1 Prohibitionist and 9 of no affiliation. In Massachusetts, 2 Independents. In Michigan there were 2 Independents and 4 of no affiliation. In Minnesota, 2 Independents, 1 Prohibitionist, and 7 without affiliation. In Missouri, 1 Independent and 4 without affiliation. In Nebraska there were 2 Independents, 1 Prohibitionist, and 11 without affiliation. In New York there were 1 Independent, 1 Socialist, and 3 without affiliation. In Ohio, 2 Independents and 5 without affiliation. In Oklahoma there were 2 Independents, 1 Prohibitionist, and 3 without affiliation. In Texas there were 2 Independents and 8 without affiliation. In South Carolina, 1 Prohibitionist and 1 without affiliation. In Vermont, 1 Independent, Virginia, 2 without affiliation. In Washington, 1 Independent and 1 without affiliation; and in Wisconsin, 3 Independents, 1 Prohibitionist, and 4 without affiliation.

The non-partisan operation of the President's order applying civil-service rules to these appointments is indicated by the correspondence conveying this information, as well as by the statistics assembled. One postmaster writes, "At time of my appointment I was Republican county chairman," and another says, "Have been Republican county chairman for 10 years." Another Republican postmaster says, "The charge of political discrimination by your department is unfounded."

Another Republican postmaster writes:

"I was one of the six who took the examination for this position. I was the only one who was a Republican; the rest were Democrats; two boasted of party influence. I simply took the exam. I had taught in grammar and high schools; been superintendent of schools for 25 years, and for 2 years had been treasurer and head bookkeeper of a corporation doing some thousands of dollars a week of business. I felt if I did not get the position there must be something wrong about "civil service," but I got it, although in the "wrong" party. I never voted a Democratic ticket in my life." * * *

Another Republican writes:

"I am returning to-day answer to your inquiry as to my party affiliation. I do not think, however, that the mere statement that I am and always have been a Republican is sufficient answer in my case to the inquiry."

"For 40 years I have edited Republican newspapers in * * *. More than 30 of those years I edited newspapers in this city. They were not merely Republican in name. I was regarded as a radical, uncompromising, "stand-pat" Republican. With that record I entered the contest for the * * * post office when it was announced that civil-service rules would govern the appointment."

"When the Civil Service Commission made its report I was the highest on the list, and my name was certified to Postmaster General Burleson, who promptly recommended me for appointment, and President Wilson at once made the appointment as recommended. If there is any question or doubt as to the fairness or consistency of the administration in living up to its pledges in this line, my own case should be sufficient to prove the doubt groundless. I desire to give my testimony as to the absolute fairness of the department in making these appointments."

After stating his party affiliation, one says:

"I feel that I should further state that I have affiliated with the Republican Party for the past 20 years."

"So far as I have been able to ascertain, the question of politics did not enter into either the examination or my subsequent appointment to this office."

One of those who disavowed any political affiliation said:

"The commission certainly never showed political favoritism in my appointment. The other candidate was a Democrat, while I lived with my father, who is a lifelong Republican and has been the judge of every election in this place for 20 years."

Another letter from a Republican shows that a very narrow margin of superiority in his rating was sufficient to secure his appointment. He says:

"I wish to state that I was appointed because I made the highest grade in the competitive examination, beating the next highest by only fifty-five one-hundredths of a point."

"This appointment came promptly and without the use of any outside influence, and I consider that the department has lived up to the letter and meaning of President Wilson's wise order."

A Republican writes:

"I received the appointment but did not accept; but I always felt that the order was administered impartially."

Another Republican says:

"I believe it my duty to express my candid and sincere belief in the impartial administration of the Executive order of March 31, 1917. Long before I received my appointment and up to the present time I have followed through the press the action of the department in making appointments, and it is my frank belief that it has been impartial in every respect."

A postmaster who reports himself as being a Democrat says:

"William took the examination at the same time I did. * * * We were competitors for the office. He was an ex-service man, wounded in 'no man's land,' and a Republican. My standing was much higher than his in the examination, but he was appointed postmaster at this office. I was glad of it; would not have taken the examination had I known he was going to take it. He resigned and I was appointed in his stead."

A Republican writes:

"I was treated with absolute fairness in every step of procedure from the time of taking the examination until I received my appointment as postmaster. I shall be glad to render any further aid in this matter that you may see fit to ask. The merit system as established by Executive order should be retained as a permanent thing or part of the Postal Service."

An independent writes:

"The records of the department will show that my appointment was bitterly opposed by the pie-eating Democrats and indorsed by the leading business men regardless of political faith. * * * On account of this opposition there was one or more investigations, and your inspector called on every business house in the city and got a personal expression from them on my appointment."

"Have voted for the following men: Bryan, President Wilson, Senator CAPPER for governor and Senator, and Governor Allen. This is why I was not considered a deserving Democrat, and the chairman of the Democratic central committee did all in his power to prevent my appointment."

Another postmaster says:

"I have always been a Republican, first, last, and all the time, and nothing was said in my application or any correspondence from the department relative to my politics, and if the matter was ever discussed at any time I had no knowledge of it and am sure that the department did not know my party affiliation at the time of my appointment."

One postmaster says that prior to his appointment it had been reported in his community that appointments were being made without regard to the civil-service order, and that he was urged to believe that he would stand no chance of appointment on account of not being a Democrat:

"I refused to believe such information"—

he says—

"for, having read the Executive order very carefully, I reached only one conclusion, that merit alone would be the deciding factor. And the results proved my decision, for had it not been for the Executive order under which I took my examination with an equal opportunity with all the other candidates, I would not be the postmaster at * * * to-day. For, being a Republican, I would have had no chance if the matter was to be decided politically."

"I am frank to say that I fail to see where there are any facts to base this criticism upon. In fact, if it was to be political and one party favored, then why was the order issued?"

"In the judgment of the writer, while a Republican, and should any changes be made, the postmaster stands in line for continuous service, yet I believe the order was one of the finest things issued from the Executive Office, for it removes all political squabbles for the postmasterships and places them upon a competitive basis. The result will be, not as often would happen, incompetency, but highest efficiency. I sincerely hope that the new administration will go one step farther and place the postmasters under the classified civil service. This will be a great step forward."

"I will further add that when I took my examination I was warned in writing by the commission not to mention religion or politics anywhere."

"It would certainly be of interest and value, I think, if the result of your inquiry could be sent to all the postmasters."

Another Republican whose appointment came as a surprise says:

"The inclosed communication does not call for more information than stated on the blank spaces, but I think my case is just a little different than most appointments. I served four terms as postmaster in this office from 1898 to 1914. When the postmaster who succeeded me resigned I was requested by patrons of the office to take up the examination. I could not see any reason for appointing a Republican, but to test the new rule of civil service I submitted my papers and was very much surprised when I received notice that I was at the head of the list and was appointed postmaster. There certainly was no political influence in my case. Had I known that the post-office appointments were going back to politics, I never would have given up a good position to come back."

Another says:

"I desire to advise that absolutely no political, religious, or fraternal affiliations were mentioned in the appointment of the postmaster at * * *. I have been a lifelong Republican and received my appointment solely on merit after passing the highest grade in the civil-service examination for the position."

One postmaster says:

"I am in possession of three commissions signed by Republican Presidents for postmaster at another office of the third class, and at the examination held for postmaster at * * * the other applicant was a Democrat and chairman of the precinct committee, so I can truthfully state that there was no discrimination shown in this case for political or other reasons. The Hon FRANK W. MONDELL will verify that he has recommended me to the previous appointments as postmaster under a Republican administration, and am satisfied that the ruling of March 31, 1917, was strictly adhered to in this case. Any further information will be cheerfully supplied."

One of the postmasters who is a Democrat writes:

"I am glad to state that in making my appointment the department adhered strictly to the presidential order of March 31, 1917. The department had no knowledge at that time of my party preference, as I made no reference thereto on the papers I submitted with my application. As a matter of fact, I had the combined opposition of both major parties in my own town, and also the opposition of the Congressman from my district. Had the appointment been made from a political standpoint I certainly would not have received it. My appointment was due to the fact that I received the highest grade in the competitive examination."

An independent says:

"Have always been strictly an independent in politics, not affiliated with any political party, but guided entirely by the issues and men presented in each campaign. Have twice voted for a Republican President and three times for a Democratic President. During the past 20 years, with one or two exceptions, I have supported the Republican Members of Congress, and generally speaking have supported the Republican State ticket. At the time I was appointed postmaster here my appointment was strongly opposed by every Democratic politician in the State."

In another instance of a Democrat being appointed the postmaster writes:

"When the civil-service examination was held to fill the position as postmaster at this office four applicants contested; three Democrats and one Republican."

"The Democrat who had the indorsement of the Democratic organization, and who had secured the appointment as acting postmaster at this office, stood third in the examination, and the Republican stood fourth, and I stood first, and in compliance with the Executive order I was nominated for the position."

"The department did not know or ask what my political affiliation was. I am convinced I could have never secured the appointment on a political basis."

A Republican writes that he was rejected by the local board in August, 1917 (draft), because of bad eyes and that his attention was called to the President's Executive order relative to the competitive appointment of postmasters and advised to take the examination. Of the four applicants who took the examination, he says:

"The other three were affiliated with the Democratic Party and two have been candidates for other offices. I and my father before me have always been affiliated with the Republican Party."

"No information was asked of me at any time as to my political affiliations, and I can say further that the Democratic committee from this precinct worked for one of the candidates and that a friend of another of the candidates who happened to be at the Capitol, made a special call in the interests of his friend, and I can also say further that one of the applicants also had petitions signed by about 25 asking for his appointment."

A Democrat, explaining how he got into office says (names being omitted):

"Politics did not enter into the appointment of the postmaster at * * * in any way."

"* * * A Republican had charge of the office at the beginning of the present administration. Soon after his time expired and an examination was held to fill the vacancy."

"He * * * and I * * * took the examination. His grade was three or four points higher than mine and he was given the position and held it five years. His health failed and he appointed his son * * * assistant."

"The office was then raised to the third class and an examination was held for third-class postmasters to fill the position at * * *. This son * * * and I took the examination. But before the appointment was made * * * resigned to take a better position in a bank, and I was appointed postmaster."

"There was no politics in it at all. It was not even suggested. The same thing happened at * * *. A Republican and a Democrat took the examination. The Republican was given the position because he passed the best examination."

It is frequently said in letters by postmasters who avow themselves to be Democrats that no political influence was used to secure their appointments and that though they were Democrats their political affiliation was not known or inquired into. One Democrat says:

"In connection with the inclosure I might say that I filed my application for the local post office, passed the examination, and was appointed and confirmed without at any time writing or asking anyone either in public or private life for any assistance. My politics could not have been known to anyone handling the matter unless such persons on his own initiative discovered what my politics were and if this was done I do not know anything about it."

One Republican postmaster closes his communication with this suggestion:

"The Republican Party will do well to copy the Democratic Party in the matter of post-office appointments. A lot of my friends thought there would be no use for me to take the examination for postmaster on account of being a Republican, but politics did not enter into the matter at all. The Democratic Party has been very fair, as far as I am concerned, and the Republican Party will make a mistake if the old political spoils system is employed in making post-office appointments."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the Senator from Tennessee separate figures as to first, second, and third class post offices as distinguished from fourth-class post offices?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not examined the statement with care, but I think so. However, I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the statement which will be found printed in the RECORD in the morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate now by going into the civil-service question, which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] have incidentally brought up, but the Senator from Tennessee referred to a statement made by me the other day and has offered some document to be printed in the RECORD, to which I have no possible objection, I presume in partial answer to what I stated.

Mr. President, I merely wish to say that so long as Senators and Representatives defend the party to which they belong in the administration of the civil service law and only complain when the opposite political party is in power we will never get very far in a fair administration of the civil service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope I did not misquote in any way the Senator from Nebraska. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator did.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator that I think he is correct in his statement. I think it is the duty of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to see, to the best of their ability, that the civil-service rules are carried out, whatever may be the administration in power. I merely produced the figures embodied in the document presented by me because they seemed to give the other side. I have no doubt that under the Democratic administration there were violations of the civil-service rules when there ought not to have been.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have called attention to many such violations from time to time, and I do not intend to go over them again now, but I wish to call attention to just one instance of the many to which I have heretofore called the attention of the Senate. I refer to the Government Printing Office. I presented to the Senate or had printed—and I think the statement was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; it ought to have been, if it was not—two columns from the page of a newspaper referring entirely to the Government Printing Office and showing demotions and promotions, and in every case a Republican was demoted and a Democrat promoted. That was under a Democratic administration. It has been the same way, to a great extent, everywhere; and one reason why is because, although we promise the people that we will enforce the civil service law fairly, when we get into power we forget our promise and do not do it.

I have, Mr. President, not defended my own party in that respect. I said the other day on the floor of the Senate that I thought we had done worse than the Democrats, so far as post offices were concerned; that it looked that way to me. We either ought to make good our promises or stop making promises, one or the other, and we ought to be just as ready to condemn violations of the civil service law where they are perpetrated by members of our party or officers of our party as though they were perpetrated by somebody else. But whenever a charge is made against a Democratic administration we see Democrats coming to the relief, and whenever a charge is made against the administration of a Republican official of the civil service we see Republicans coming to the relief.

I believe in the civil service; I think we must have it in order to have an efficient Government, but I have repeatedly stated that I have perfect respect for those who do not agree with me; they may be right, but I think they are wrong. If, however, a majority of Congress thinks they are right, then we ought to wipe off the statute books the civil service law and stop pretending something which we do not believe and claiming a virtue which we do not possess.

CORWIN'S ARTICLE ON TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this week's issue of the New Republic contains a very able article on "Tax-exempt securities," by Edward S. Corwin, professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University and the author of several books on constitutional law. The article reviews the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question. In view of the constitutional amendment in reference to tax-exempt securities which is now pending in Congress, it seems to me that the article is a valuable contribution to the discussion of the subject, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES.

That a Constitution framed for an agricultural community with a population of 3,000,000 should still, after 135 years, furnish the basis of government for a highly industrialized Nation of 110,000,000 souls, the majority of whom are city dwellers, is a frequent theme for marvel; and the explanation usually forthcoming is that the decisions of the Supreme Court have kept the Constitution flexible—have, in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, "adapted" it "to the various crises of human affairs." The explanation has unquestionably this limited truth: The Supreme Court has not always, or even generally, followed the narrowest possible reading of the Constitution. On the other hand, it should be remembered that the court is not an originating body, that the utmost it can do is to ratify what Congress or the President has initiated, and that its distinctive rôle is one of control rather than of instigation. Furthermore, there are occasions when desirable policy encounters constitutional difficulties which are clearly not due to the Constitution as it would be construed by an intelligent man reading it at first hand, but to a sophisticated gloss upon it to be found in the decisions. For instance, consider the growing embarrassment with which the ever increasing quantity of governmental bonds exempt from taxation confronts both the National and the State Governments to-day. I venture to suggest the question whether a constitutional amendment is really necessary to meet this situation—whether, in other words, the Constitution is not already a good enough Constitution so far as this matter is concerned.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land; constitutional law—the decisions of the court—is only derivative law. The whole body of doctrine upon which the exemption of governmental securities from taxation rests—so far as such exemption is not a voluntary donation from a State or the National Government—is simply judge-made law, for which the text of the Constitution furnishes not a single peg; and what is more, it is to-day judge-made law which later law from the same source goes far to discredit.

The starting point is furnished by the famous decision in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 316; 1819), in which the court, speaking through Marshall, held that Maryland was not entitled to tax the business of a branch of the United States Bank at Baltimore. In the course of his opinion the Chief Justice advances three different reasons for this holding: First, he says, it would be wrong for one sovereignty to tax the agencies of another; but then "waiving this theory," he, in the second place, invokes the supremacy of the National Government within its sphere of action; finally, he indicates that Congress impliedly exempted the bank from State taxation in the act of establishing it.

But in the later case of Osborn v. The Bank (9 Wheat. 738, 1821) he bases the bank's exemption exclusively upon this last ground; and this is obviously the correct ground, invoking as it does no extraconstitutional theories but simply the power of Congress to pass "all laws necessary and proper" to keep the National Government and its agencies functioning efficiently. And this, moreover, is the doctrine to-day so far as national banks are concerned, their taxation by the States being regulated in all respects by section 5219 of the Revised Statutes. Why, then, should not the same rule apply to national bonds? And if it does, why a constitutional amendment for the purpose of subjecting such bonds to taxation by the States as property in the hands of their owners? It may be added that even as matters stand they are taxable as part of an inheritance.

Let us now turn to the other side of the problem—the exemption of State and local bonds from national taxation. The leading case is Collector v. Day (11 Wall. 113, 1870), in which the court held that the salary of a State judge was not subject to a national income tax. The argument of the court owes something to the first of the three grounds advanced by Marshall in the McCulloch case, but flatly contradicts the second ground and ignores the third. Far more important, however, as a source of this decision was Marshall's celebrated dictum in the earlier case that "the power to tax involves the power to destroy." This being so, the court argued in effect: If we permit Congress to tax the salary of a State judge at all, it may tax all salaries of all State judges to extinction, and thus destroy the State judiciaries. Unfortunately the court overlooked the obvious fact that in taxing the salaries of State judges to the point of extinction by a general income tax Congress would be taxing all other incomes to extinction also, and so nobody would have any money left wherewith to pay State judges their salaries. The doctrine of the decision is in truth the veriest nonsense and is not supported in the remotest way by a single word in the Constitution; on the contrary, as already suggested, it flies in the face of the supremacy which is guaranteed by the Constitution to acts of Congress made in pursuance of it, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The one thing that may be urged in partial extenuation of the court's action in Collector v. Day is a possible fear on its part that Congress might some time undertake to tax the salaries of State officials as such; but it should have waited for that highly improbable situation to arise, when it could have reminded Congress of the guaranty which by Article IV of the Constitution the United States extends to every State in this Union of a republican form of government.

But remote as the danger was in 1870, it is still more remote to-day on account of the principles which have been since developed against all sorts of rankly discriminatory legislation. In the light of recent doctrine it may indeed be questioned if an act which imposed a special tax upon salaries of State officials or upon incomes derived from State and municipal bonds could be considered a tax in the constitutional sense, such a classification not being a reasonable one for purposes of taxation. (See Brushaber v. Union Pacific Co., 240 U. S. 1, and the recent Child Labor case.) The doctrine of Collector v. Day and of the decisions following in its track is in short out of date. Furthermore, the logic of it has been abandoned by the court itself. Thus in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S. 107, 1910) the Supreme Court sustained the right of Congress to tax the privilege of doing business as a corporation. It is difficult to see how a general income tax which incidentally taxes incomes from municipal and State bonds is a tax on the State's borrowing power if a special tax on the privilege of doing business as a corporation is not a tax on the power of the State to charter corporations. As a matter of fact, any such view of the effect of a general income tax involves a fine-spun theory of the incidence of taxation which may be interesting for purposes of speculation, but from a practical point of view is deserving only of impatient rejection.

But at this point in my argument I can see the widows and orphans—who are invariably the owners of governmental bonds when any question of their taxation is to the fore—showing signs of acute nervousness, and presently an indignant protest is launched against any attempt to discredit a principle on the faith of which, first and last, billions of securities have been bought and sold. Is the Supreme Court, the question is put, which stands by to see that the States pass no laws impairing the obligation of contracts, to be asked to do that very thing by overturning a decision of half a century standing? The question seems a formidable one, but I believe it can be met. There is really no need of overturning Collector v. Day and its successors to date, thus canceling the immunities they confer upon earlier issues of securities, provided only the Supreme Court, recognizing the inherent weakness of those decisions, repairs with a fresh mind to the interpretation of the sixteenth amendment as cases affecting issues of later date come before it.

The sixteenth amendment reads as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

That this language should not be given a retrospective application has just been conceded, but why should it not be held to determine the law in all other respects? What could be more comprehensive than the words "from whatever source derived"? Nor is it perceived by what rule of logic or syntax the ensuing phrases subtract from the literal force thereof.

Nevertheless, it is insisted that it was not the intention of those who framed the amendment to enlarge Congress's power in the way of taxing incomes, but only to relieve it of a certain mode of procedure; that the immediate occasion of the amendment was the decision in Pollock v. The Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 429; 158 U. S. 601; 1895) that taxes on incomes derived from property were "direct," and so required apportionment; that the objection was raised against the amendment while it was pending that it would enable the National Government to tax incomes from State and municipal bonds, and was refuted by supporters of the amendment. However, the answer is clear. It was in this very Pollock case that the doctrine was first explicitly announced—on the basis of Collector v. Day, to be sure—that incomes from State and municipal bonds were exempt from taxation by the National Government; and if it was the intention of the framers of the amendment to overcome that decision in part, why not in whole? Why should they have wished to make two bites of the cherry? Again, the objection mentioned was raised by quite as good authority as that by which it was answered—perhaps better, since Mr. Hughes has subsequently sat on the Supreme Court, an honor which has never befallen Mr. Root. But finally, in view of the explicit language of the amendment, the intentions of its framers are a matter of absolutely no importance. For the court to abandon the solid footing of the words of the amendment in order to embark on a voyage of discovery for the intentions of the Congress which proposed it and the 40 or so legislatures which ratified it would be an outright repudiation of the rules of constitutional construction (see e. g. Addystone Pipe & Steel Co., 175 U. S. 211).

But it is urged further that the Supreme Court itself has adopted the view that the sixteenth amendment was not intended to enlarge Congress's power of taxing incomes. What is meant is that certain justices have expressed this view obiter, for the point has not been directly involved in any case to date. The most debatable case is that of Evans v. Gore (253 U. S. 245; 1919), in which the court held that to assess an income tax against a salary of a judge of the United States who was in office when the tax was enacted would amount to a diminution of salary contrary to article 3, section 1, of the Constitution. In other words, the general terms of the sixteenth amendment leave this more specific provision still operative. But that is far from saying that the amendment leaves standing a mere doctrine which can claim no such support from the language of the instrument, albeit this doctrine was brought sharply to the attention of the framers of the amendment, so that they might easily have chosen terms to safeguard it.

Approached without preconceptions, the sixteenth amendment clearly gives the power to tax incomes from municipal and State bonds, as well as the salaries of State officials, by a general income tax. The perplexity of otherwise intelligent citizens when they are told, on the authority of Collector v. Day and the Pollock case, that the contrary is the fact is ample proof of this assertion. Nor, indeed, is there any good reason why the owners of such securities or the recipients of such salaries should not be called upon to discharge to the full the normal duties of national good citizenship. As was remarked above, any attempt by Congress to discriminate unfavorably in such cases would raise radically different questions, but, contrariwise, there is no constitutional reason why it should discriminate favorably.

To sum up: The question of tax-exempt securities presents four aspects: (1) The exemption of national securities from national taxation is obviously a matter which rests with Congress alone, consequently no constitutional amendment is necessary to cure this phase of the mischief. (2) The exemption of State and municipal securities from local taxation is likewise a matter which rests with the State; so again no constitutional amendment is demanded. (3) The exemption of national securities from State taxation is, it seems clear, a matter to be determined by Congress within the broad limits set by the "necessary and proper" clause; consequently no constitutional amendment is required to abate this phase of the evil. (4) Finally, the exemption of incomes derived from State and municipal bonds, from national income taxation, which never rested on any better foundation than a highly vulnerable precedent of constitutional law, has been done away with by the simple, literal reading of the sixteenth amendment. By this amendment Congress may tax incomes "from whatever source derived." Words could not be clearer unless, perhaps, to adapt a saying of the late Judge Gaynor, Congress had chosen to add, "these words mean what they say."

In short, no constitutional amendment dealing with this subject is necessary, and none should be proposed by Congress which might in any way prejudice the speedy determination of the question on the basis of the existing Constitution, the way for which should be facilitated by the necessary changes in the present income tax law. If in reaching a proper result the court should find it desirable to overrule Evans v. Gore, that, too, would be all to the good.

EDWARD S. CORWIN,

MUSTAPHA KEMAL—CONDITIONS IN NEAR EAST.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to a remarkable address to the American people by Mustapha Kemal, leader of Turkey. I do not wish to take up any time of the Senate to read it, but it is something which every Senator and Member should see, for here is a man who speaks the American language, though he be a Turk; a man who is highly educated; one who is informed with regard to the history of the nations of the world; a man who declares with authority the purpose of the nationalists of Turkey, what they are trying to accomplish. He is entitled to a hearing. What he declares, in substance, is that they are striving to get rid of outside domination so that the Turks may develop their own life in their own way, just as our forefathers established this Republic. I believe that the American people are in favor of having Turkey enjoy territorial integrity and political independence; and that the American people do not wish to see the Allies or any nation in the world invade Turkey and deprive the Turks of their political independence in any way whatever. I ask, without reading, to have printed in the Record this address, together with the interview of Mustapha Kemal, with regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

KEMAL DEMANDS ABSOLUTE INDEPENDENCE FOR TURKEY—IS READY TO RESUME WAR—TURKISH NATIONALIST LEADER, WHO SELECTS GEORGE WASHINGTON AS HIS MODEL, URGES AMERICANS TO UNDERSTAND TURKS' INTENSE DESIRE FOR LIBERTY—SAYS FOREIGN PROPAGANDA BLINDS EYES HERE—FREEDOM FOR ALL, BUT NO SPECIAL PRIVILEGES, ESPECIALLY FOR CHRISTIANS—ASKS JUSTICE, BUT RELIES ON ARMY—PLANS FOR NATIONAL REJUVENATION.

TEXT OF MUSTAPHA KEMAL'S ADDRESS TO AMERICAN PEOPLE.

(By Mustapha Kemal.)

To the great American Nation:

You have expelled tyranny and despotism from your country. You have obtained and established your freedom and independence after a long and sanguinary struggle, and you have built up a civilized, strong, democratic State based upon the sovereignty of the people.

On the opposite side of the earth there is to-day another nation that is struggling and shedding blood for the same aims of freedom, independence, and democracy. They seek to blind your eyes to the purity and elevation of those aims. The authors of this propaganda are either ignorant fanatics or the agents of those who are openly or secretly fighting against us to frustrate and destroy our newly won liberty. Do not believe calumniators.

Keep your hearts open to the Turkish people, who are fighting for freedom and independence, and sincerely striving to become an element of progress and justice in the world, like yourselves.

(Copyright, 1923, by the New York Herald.)

[Special cable dispatch.]

ANGORA, January 24.—To be registered in history as the George Washington of his country is the characteristic ambition best picturing the personality of Mustapha Kemal Pasha, the national hero of Turkey resuscitated.

"The great George Washington, foremost modern pioneer of liberty, who won independence for his country by driving out the foreign despots oppressing it, is the man whose example inspires and influences me most deeply," was Kemal's spontaneous reply to the question which great character in history he chiefly admired.

Those words are a revelation of Kemal's past achievements as well as future hopes. Like that great American whom he passionately desires to emulate, he has vanquished the foe in the field and is ready to devote his genius to peaceful organization of the nation he has liberated, but nothing except complete and absolute independence of his country will satisfy him, and if the great European powers can not yet bring themselves to recognize it he is prepared to resume and carry on the struggle until force of arms imposes it upon their comprehension.

FROM OBSCURITY TO MASTERSHIP.

This man who has led the Turkish people to final victory after 10 years of misfortunes and defeats is not quite 43 years old. Three years ago, although his brilliant defense of the Dardanelles during the Great War had attracted the attention of military specialists, his name was practically unknown to the world. Disgraced by Enver Pasha, who sensed a dangerous rival, he lived apparently an idle life of pleasure in Constantinople during the early days of the allied occupation while secretly forming a nucleus of devoted patriots with whose aid he suddenly launched that desperate coup in Anatolia which was eventually to make him master of the situation in the Near East.

No visitor upon whom Kemal fixes the strange, concentric gaze of steel blue eyes, rendered uncannily intuitive and inscrutable by the slightest possible squint, can doubt for an instant he is in the presence of a born leader of men. There is no escaping that enveloping omniscient squint, which seems to have the power to read all hidden thoughts and penetrate all the secrets and motives of men, and it must be an alarming experience indeed to come before him with a bad conscience or an insincere heart.

IS "GUEST" OF HIS ARMY.

Kemal's house in Angora is called "Echoing Rock" because of the isolated stony eminence upon which it stands, dominating the sprawling town on the flat plain. It was presented to him by the grand assembly, but he immediately transferred the gift to the army, so he resides there as the guest of his soldiers. The approach is guarded by volunteers, wild but faithful fellows from Trebizond, clad in the sinister black nationalist costume.

Angora is by no means a "forbidden city." Kemal mixes freely among its inhabitants, taking any seat happening to be vacant in the crowded little hall of the National Assembly, like an ordinary deputy, but foreigners are stringently and efficiently probed before they are allowed to visit the capital or enter Kemal's presence.

Like all really great men, Kemal is no extremist. There is no mental affinity between him and the Russian Bolshevik leaders. His views are moderate, and he expresses them with moderation. So, when he says a thing can be done, you feel it is capable of realization, not a fanatical dream. Even in denouncing what he believes to be injustice he strives to avoid injustice himself. While formulating his appeal to the American people he criticized America's attitude toward the Near East crisis, but tempered his censure by expressing the belief that it was not at all America's fault, and that it occasioned surprise rather than anger among his fellow citizens.

FIGHTING FOR THEIR FREEDOM.

"Americans," he declared, "seem not to realize the sacrifices the Turkish people have made, the trials through which they have passed in order to reconquer their long-lost liberty. Otherwise the United States Government and the press surely had shown greater fairness in judging events in the Near East. The Turkish people are fighting for freedom from foreign domination and exploitation just as the Americans fought 150 years ago, for Turkey has been reduced during the last century to the conditions of a colony of the great European powers."

"But the American people have not been allowed to discern the similarity between the struggle of the Turks to-day and the war of independence of the American colonists."

"Foreign propaganda, ignorant fanaticism, and prejudice have blinded the eyes of America to the truth. If she should open them without heeding insidious falsehood propagated by foreign agents, she would see valiant people risking its all against a world of enemies for the conquest of the same rights that found immortal expression in the American Declaration of Independence."

A NEW ORIENTAL TYPE.

Kemal appears to be the ideal representative of an entirely new type of oriental, whose existence the west is only dimly beginning to realize, but which it will be forced to take into account very seriously in the future.

Till now the western mind has been accustomed to regard the oriental patriot, whether Turk, Arab, Egyptian, or Hindoo, as a fanatical dreamer prone to sudden wild outbursts of enthusiasm and energy, but incapable of sustained effort, not amenable to disciplined organization, and easily corruptible by European gold. The type still exists—there are idle boasters and traitors even in Angora, but it is rapidly becoming extinct and its place is being taken by men like Kemal and his associates, calm, efficient, incorruptible hard workers.

DISPLAY TRUE EFFICIENCY.

The most convincing evidence that a new era has dawned for the East over the barren table-land of Anatolia is the efficiency and strict attention to business displayed by everyone in Angora, army officers of all ranks, deputies, and high and low governmental officials. Here, as in Asia Minor, removed from corrupting influences which for 50 years have come to the oriental in the guise of western civilization, a new race of men has developed, amid the sacrifices and hardships of an originally almost suicidal struggle, whose bravery, honesty, and abnegation of self justify belief that the renaissance of the East is no longer an empty dream.

It is needful to comprehend this fundamental change which the oriental mentality is undergoing in order to realize that Kemal's plan for instituting in Turkey the most democratic régime in the world is practical to-day. Before the nationalist movement in Anatolia it would have been madness.

"Turkey's future form of government," Kemal explained, "will be democratic in the fullest sense of the term. The right of sovereignty will be invested in the people and exercised by the national assembly, composed of members elected by the people. The national assembly will in turn exercise its authority through the council of commissars whom it chooses among its members."

WILL HAVE NO PRESIDENT.

The system differs from both the American and Swiss forms of republican government, for there is no President. Kemal himself, though president of the national assembly, has no special authority beyond that inherent in his dominant personality.

"For more than a century," he continued, "the Turkish people have desperately striven to establish their own Government upon a democratic basis like this; they tried to assimilate the scientific and political progress achieved by western countries during the nineteenth century. Turk intellectuals attempted to introduce reforms by bringing specialists from Europe. Not a few of Turkish enlightened sons sacrificed their lives for this end."

"But European diplomacy placed innumerable obstacles in the Turkish people's path to progress; did everything in its power to retard and prevent Turkey's growing strong and prosperous, fearing she might cast off the yoke of Europe's exploitation and domination. However, this selfish hostility of Europe toward everything spelling reform and revival in Turkey overshot its mark, for it inflamed the Turkish people with a passionate desire for freedom, which has found its final expression in Angora."

"To-day victorious Turkey takes herself, without asking permission, political and economic liberties enjoyed by all civilized nations."

TURKEY'S CULTURED FUTURE.

The correspondent was curious to know Kemal's opinion on a question that is considerably agitating the patriots in Angora and all oriental nationalists, as to whether the Turks or other eastern peoples should seek salvation in the assimilation of western civilization or hold themselves aloof and rather try to recreate a civilization of their own based upon their ancient culture. As always, his reply was characteristic of the moderation of his well-balanced intellect.

"My earnest desire," said Kemal, "is that Turkey will profit by the scientific and commercial progress of the west and by western civilization generally in so far as is compatible with her own national culture. The ancient civilization of Turkey was halted in its development by the continual clash of political ambitions in Europe, which forced the Turks in the time of their greatness to devote all their energies to war, and later by the intrigues of European statesmen who wish to keep Turkey in subjection. But now these obstacles are being removed, one by one, and Turkey will be free to perfect her ancient culture while adopting all that is most valuable of the modern civilization of the west."

Asked whether there was any prospect of Americans being called upon to assist in the modern reconstruction of Turkey, Kemal replied: "We shall gladly welcome the help of the American specialists. I particularly hope the Turks may learn American business methods through the establishment of close trade relations between the two countries. American commerce may always be assured of full protection in Turkey."

Kemal is keenly aware that the chief obstacle to American appreciation of the effort the Turkish people are making to regain the former greatness is the situation of Christian minorities in Turkey. He unhesitatingly expressed the most solemn assurance that Christian citizens of the new Turkey will enjoy the same protection and rights as Moslems, provided they obey the laws of their country and refrain from revolutionary activities.

NO PRIVILEGES FOR CHRISTIANS.

"All Christians in Turkey," was his declaration, "will enjoy equal rights and protection with Moslems. They will be safe from persecution. But to no Christian minority will ever again be granted privileges exceeding the rights of the Moslem majority. The greatest blunder the Turks ever made was when, centuries ago, they conferred privileges and favors which no other nation ever dreamed of giving aliens upon Christians who entered the Turkish dominions."

"The Turks were actuated by a love for freedom and deep respect for the rights of others, which are great virtues from an idealistic point of view. But in practice they proved disastrous, and the Turkish Empire's decline and misfortunes date from this ill-advised preferential treatment of foreigners. Turkey is determined to grant no other rights in the future to foreigners within her borders, save those which are enjoyed by aliens in all other civilized countries. The same applies to scientific institutions and schools established by foreigners in our country. They will have full protection as long as they respect our laws by including the teaching of the language, history, and geography of Turkey in their educational program, and accepting our control and inspection."

On the wall of Kemal's library hangs a great crooked saber presented to him after the Battle of Sangarlar by the famous sheik of the Senussi, the most powerful and most fantastical Arab chieftain of the present day. It is a symbol of what the Turk leader represents in the eyes of millions of Moslems impatient of European rule.

Angora is the great center of oriental nationalist activities—Afghan, Arabian, Egyptian, and Indian missions are continually arriving—and the atmosphere is impregnated with the problem of pan-Islamism, the menace of a great war of independence of the East against the West. But questions regarding these dark possibilities for the first time drew a diplomatic reply from Kemal:

"If the principle of self-determination established by Woodrow Wilson is admitted, it is manifestly impossible that Turkey should not wish to see all Moslem peoples become free and independent," was his cryptic statement. Likewise, with reference to Turco-Russian relations, all he would say was, "There is no reason why the relations between Turkey and Russia should not be as friendly in the future as they have been up to the present."

In the field Kemal is as frugal and inured to hardships as any Anatolian peasant or soldier—he and his staff lived on baked beans 14 days during the campaign that ended with the capture of Smyrna—but in his Angora home he does not disdain a certain refined elegance. His library is tastefully furnished with fine carpets; curious old daggers and pistols hang on the walls, and well-bound books are scattered over the table.

CONVERTED TO PROHIBITION.

In his days of misfortune under Enver Pasha's despotic and corrupt rule he was famous for the variety of pink, yellow, and green liquors with which he furnished his sideboard, but to-day he is an earnest advocate of prohibition as decreed by the national assembly. Undeterred by America's experiences, he declared, "The Turks by nature are not a drinking people, wherefore the enforcement of prohibition in Turkey can present no difficulties."

In a land that admits polygamy, Kemal has remained single up to the present day. It is rumored he is engaged to a beautiful, wealthy young lady of a good Turkish family in Smyrna, and it was stated even that the wedding would take place upon his arrival in that city on his present tour of inspection, but the death of his mother, who was particularly desirous of bringing about the match, may have changed his plans. His conception of the rôle of women in society is diametrically opposed to traditional Turkish views. He will have none of the veil of the harem, which, indeed, is fast disappearing. His declarations on this subject were categorical:

"One of the most important problems confronting the Turkey of to-day is to secure absolute legal and social equality for women and men. Our women have displayed the highest qualities of courage and self-sacrifice in the war of independence in which we have been engaged. They are eager to acquire education and learning, and some of them already are achieving success in the fields of science and literature. Women also already are working in many industrial establishments throughout Anatolia. No progress is possible where the forcible seclusion of women destroys family life."

Kemal is frankly skeptical of the pacifist movement that has held the western world in its grip since the Great War.

"Disarmament and permanent peace," he said, "will be possible when particularly the statesmen of the great powers have learned to recognize the equal rights of all nations, great and small, to prosperity and independence—and not before."

DARKNESS SHROUDS ITS FUTURE.

The future of Turkey is still shrouded in the darkness that is ominously spreading over the whole Eastern Hemisphere, and it remains to be seen whether Kemal's great projects for the renaissance of the Turkish people will be realized or will once again be retarded and frustrated by war. War would delay and cast into jeopardy all the great plans for the reconstruction of his country which are dear to his heart. But it is equally certain he is determined to take the field again if he fails to obtain such peace terms for his country as he considers necessary in order to effect this reconstruction successfully.

Ending the interview, this victorious general, who is most often seen in civilian clothes, declared:

"The happiest moment of my life was when I smashed the Greek Armies in the pitched battles of Adum Karahissar and Dumlupinar and I knew my country was saved. Our army is even stronger to-day than then, and is ready to do duty again if needful. The Turkish people is so passionately attached to its liberty that it is prepared to make every sacrifice in order to safeguard it. The best qualities of the Turks are fidelity to their promises, faithfulness to their friends, and unflinching devotion to the independence of their country."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has offered for the RECORD what he denominates a remarkable address issued by Mustapha Kemal to the American people. The Senator refers to this revolutionary Turkish leader as a man of education and one who is advised concerning the "history of nations."

And, with a fine sense of justice, the able Senator declares that the Ottoman Turks are entitled to a hearing before the bar of public opinion and are also entitled to liberty and to the enjoyment of political rights. I will not disagree with the distinguished Senator in these views, but in determining what attitude should be taken toward the Turks and what restrictions, if any, should be imposed upon them by the allied and associated powers, many facts and circumstances must be taken into consideration. Of course, speaking academically, the Ottoman Turks have the right to freedom and independence and to establish a form of government which to them seems best, but that is not the paramount question at issue now between the Turks and the allied nations and the United States.

The appeal by Kemal Pasha, to which the Senator refers, is a most adroit and intriguing document. One would suppose that it emanated from a man who had been schooled in democracy and who was guided by the spirit of a Hampden or a Chatham or a Patrick Henry and was seeking to extend the principles of liberty throughout the world. It is a subtle appeal, which undoubtedly, it is hoped, will temper the sharp edge of world-wide criticism because of the barbarities perpetrated by the Kemalists and the Turks upon Christian minorities within what have been and doubtless will be the boundaries of the Turkish Empire. It is likewise an appeal to justify the refusal of the Turks to abide by the treaty of Sevres or to enter into a fair and just treaty with the allied representatives during the protracted negotiations at Lausanne.

Mr. President, the publicity given to this statement by Mustapha Kemal calls for some reply and justifies a discussion, within proper limits, of what is known as "the Turkish question," which comprises the issues presented in the Near East. I read in this morning's paper the statement the Senator from Oklahoma has just placed before us and am somewhat surprised that it so soon finds its way into the RECORD. In order that we may have a better understanding of the situation and be better prepared to determine just what the rights of the Ottoman Turks are it is proper that a hasty though obviously an imperfect review of certain historical facts should be made, and in so doing I want to present the cause of the Armenians and show what they have suffered at the hands of the Turks, including this same Mustapha Kemal.

Kemal Pasha assumes that the Turks rightfully occupy the territory which constituted the kingdom of Armenia and all of Asia Minor and are entitled to the possession and control of Thrace and perhaps other territory in Europe; and he assumes the competency of the Turks to govern and to extend freedom and justice to all races and creeds within the boundaries of Turkish authority. Perhaps title to land, if not to peoples, may be acquired by prescription initiated by force and violence and maintained by cruelty and bloodshed. But one can be forgiven for questioning the validity of such title and requiring that other muniments of title be submitted in the court of public opinion and before the bar of international justice. A discussion of the Turkish question compels an examination of conditions in western Asia and in what we call the Balkan territory, anterior to the appearance of the oriental hordes which swept down from central Asia in more recent times.

We have heard much of the Armenians and have for many years protested against the cruel policies executed by the Turks, which had for their object the extermination of this splendid race. But there are many who do not know the history of this brave people, and there are some who are inclined to think that they have sought to intrude themselves into Turkish territory and usurp the authority exercised by the Turkish Government. The fact is that the Armenians migrated to Asia Minor from southeastern Europe more than 2,500 years ago. They belong to the Aryan race and find their roots in the same soil from which sprang European peoples. Philologists declare their language to be Indo-European and their literature gives support to that view.

The historian Strabo declares that they migrated from Thessaly and established themselves in the country which for centuries has been called Armenia. Professor Ripley, in his valuable work The Races of Europe, states that:

The second racial type in this borderland (Armenia) between Europe and Asia we may safely follow Chantre in calling Armenoid, because the Armenians most clearly represent it to-day. . . . The similarity of this to our Alpine races of western Europe has been especially emphasized by the most competent authority, Von Luschan. . . . Were it not for the potent selective influence of religion (Christianity and Mohammedanism) complete rupture by the invading Tartar-Turks might conceivably have taken place. As it is, the continuity of the Alpine races across Asia Minor can not be doubted.

I mentioned the historian Strabo. He refers to the origin of the Armenian people and speaks of Jason and his expedition into Armenia, and states that from "Armeus the country had its name."

Some historians of note claim that the progenitors of the Armenians migrated from Thrace about 1,400 years B. C., and after crossing into Asia they passed through Bythnia and entered Cappadocia and Cilicia, from which countries, some time in the seventh or eighth century, B. C., they reached the broad plateau upon which is Mount Ararat. In this region they remained and extended their occupation until they brought within their authority that vast region which was known as the kingdom of Armenia, and with the boundaries of which, generally speaking, we are familiar.

I think it is now accepted by historians and philologists that the Illyrians, whom we now know as the Albanians, the Phrygians, the Greeks, and the Armenians all belong to the same branch of the Aryan family. At one time it was believed by some writers that the Armenian language was a branch of the Persian, but that view is discredited and is no longer accepted by authorities who have written upon the origin of races and the development of languages. The earlier boundaries of Armenia may not perhaps be definitely determined, but it is generally agreed by historians that Armenia at one time embraced that vast domain extending from the Black and Caspian Seas southwesterly to the Mediterranean Sea, comprising an area of approximately 150,000 square miles. Cilicia, or, as it is sometimes called, Lesser Armenia, which borders upon the extreme northeastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea, constituted its southwesterly extremity.

To the west of Armenia is Anatolia, which we commonly call Asia Minor. The greater part of Armenia is a vast plateau from which rise mountains and within which are found valleys and deserts. It possesses varied resources and contains extensive and valuable agricultural lands and rich mineral deposits. The Armenians were in contact with the Potian Greeks, who occupied a portion of Asia Minor to the west of Armenia and along the southern littoral of the Black Sea, as well as with the Hellenic peoples of the Mediterranean and Aegean Seas. To the south and east were the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, and Persians, and the various races and peoples who inhabited the successive kingdoms that rose and fell in Persia and Mesopotamia.

The Armenians were known to be a strong, vigorous, intellectual, and progressive people. Long prior to the days of Caesar and the dawn of the Christian era their fame had spread throughout the civilized world. During the ministry of St. Paul they were visited by the Apostles Thaddeus and Bartholomew, who introduced Christianity among them. The new faith spread throughout the land, and about the year 300 A. D. it was accepted by the King of Armenia, who established it as the State religion. From that time until the present, the Armenian race have persevered in their adherence to the Christian faith.

Some historians state that the inhabitants of what is called Armenia are first mentioned in the annals of the Assyrians many hundred years before Christ. The Assyrian armies made war upon them, but in the ninth century before Christ the Armenians united and formed what was called the Kingdom of Urartu. These same historians contend that the powerful Kingdom of the Medes made war upon the Kingdom of Urartu and brought its inhabitants under rule of that powerful nation. It is further shown by these historians that later King Darius of Persia asserted dominion over the great plateau north of Mesopotamia and south of the Caucasus Mountains, and which was inhabited by the Armenian race.

During the period of Persian domination Armenia was divided into two satrapies for administrative purposes. But these political subdivisions were practically independent, the people paying but a small tribute to the Persian Government. In the second century before Christ the Armenians revolted from the authority of the Seleucid King of western Asia. A few centuries later Tigranes the Great became King over Armenia. He possessed great executive and administrative ability and brought honor and fame to his country. He was related to Mithradites, the famous Pontic King, who sought to build an empire uniting the Hellenic and Iranian peoples. The Roman power, however, shattered his dream and also constituted an impediment to the growth and development of the Armenian Kingdom, which now became a buffer State between Rome on the west and the Parthian rulers of Iran.

Tigranes developed the spirit of Armenian nationality and linked the Armenian people to the West, removing from them any veneer of Persian Zoroasterianism.

For several centuries Armenia was in the eddy of the great contending forces of the East and the West. It was besieged and assailed by the Parthian armies, and upon the death of King Tiridates, who had accepted Christianity and established it as the State religion, his kingdom fell, a portion of the people coming under Persian rule and the residue acknowledging Roman authority.

But the Armenians remained devoted to the new faith which they had espoused, and no persecution was sufficient to alienate them from that faith. For several centuries the conflicting tides of the East and the West rolled over them, but they clung to their national church and to their political ideals, whether their rulers were Persians or Romans.

In the seventh century the control of western Asia passed to the Arabs, and in the eighth or ninth century the power of the caliphate declined and the Armenians established a Christian principality which survived for several centuries. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries nomadic Turkish tribes marched from Asia and fell upon Persia and Armenia and countries which had been controlled for several centuries by the Arabs. The Armenian rulers sought protection from the Roman Empire of the East, but its lethargy and inherent weakness afforded but slight protection against the savage assaults of the barbarous Asiatic Turks in their western movements.

Near the end of the thirteenth century the Karluchs and other wild Asiatic hordes invaded western Asia and the barbarous Mongols, who destroyed civilization wherever they found it, swept through Persia and over the Armenian plateau during the same century. For several centuries anarchy and chaos reigned in western Asia. Then came the Osmanli to power. This was a Turkish clan which attempted to bring under its authority western Asia and eastern Europe. It expanded across the Dardanelles and extended its authority as far as the gates of Vienna. Armenia was completely overrun as early as 1514, and in the sixteenth century the eastern world from Vienna to Persia was linked under one control. From that time until the present, broadly speaking, Armenia, except the Province of Erivan, which was conquered by the Persians in the seventeenth century and held until 1834, when it was ceded to Russia, and the Province of Kars, which was acquired by Russia in 1878, has been under Turkish rule.

It will thus be perceived that the Armenians for centuries constituted the outer bulwark of western civilization, against which the invasions of Mongols and Turks and Tartars and Saracens and barbaric hordes were directed. They occupied the great highways leading from southeastern Europe to Asia, and along these highways wild Asiatic hordes traveled like successive billows of the sea seeking the conquest of superior races and the acquisition of the lands which were the homes and countries of other races.

The pages of history do not record a more courageous and valorous people than the Armenians. None have exhibited greater fidelity to their religious convictions and to their ideals. Besieged upon every hand, robbed and plundered and butchered by successive invading hordes, they survived; however, millions were killed, and the tragedies and sorrows with which they were visited only strengthened the faith of survivors, increased their tenacity, and nerved them for still greater sorrows and heavier persecutions. The Ottoman Turks, when they inundated their territory, destroyed hundreds of their towns and cities, and slaughtered hundreds of thousands of their people. They conquered Mesopotamia, Armenia, Syria, Palestine, the country we call Asia Minor, and pushed on into western Europe. It was the Armenian people who held back for many years the Tartars and the Turks, and thus enabled the peoples of Europe to prepare themselves for the final contest before the gates of Vienna in 1683. The victorious march of these barbarous hordes was stayed and they were thrown back into the Balkan Peninsula. Greece, Constantinople, Thrace, and the territory which we now know as Bulgaria, Rumania, Serbia, all passed under the crescent of the Turk. The heavy hand of Turkey was laid upon the Armenian people. Wild bands of Kurds and Turks and Tartars settled in their midst, robbed them of their lands, plundered them of their property, and inflicted upon them cruel persecutions. The Turkish Government, controlled often by fiends and monsters, imposed upon them oppressive burdens and enforced cruel and merciless edicts.

Under the rule of their own kings and rulers the Armenians enjoyed a large degree of freedom and reached a high place in the civilization of nations. Their frugality and industry, their love of home and country, their earnest application to the development of their fields, and their industrial life gave them a preeminence among the nations and peoples surrounding them which was not denied by their contemporaries and which historians have affirmed. They built cities and towns, established industries, and developed a large domestic and foreign trade and commerce which added to their wealth and influence. Upon the shores of three seas they built ships and constructed ports from which rich argosies came and went, adding to their wealth and national prosperity. They developed remarkable ability in business pursuits and enterprises and pioneered the way into other countries for the sale of their products. They brought remote peoples together and nations into contact, through trade and by means of commercial transactions. While possessing a strong nationalistic spirit and a pride in their own land, they were catholic in their views and sought to break down narrow and provincial prejudices and those extreme racial antipathies which have been provocative of so much controversy and, indeed, bloodshed in the past. As I have indicated, for centuries prior to the conquest of their country by the Turks they had been assailed by the wild, barbarous tribes and the nomadic forces from western and central Asia and had sustained losses and been the victims of cruel and rapacious raids and destructive ravages.

The topography of their country, with its lofty mountains and mighty valleys and plains, influenced the character of the people. The historian Buckle, in his monumental work, attempts to establish the thesis that physical surroundings and climatic conditions not only influence but perhaps determine the thoughts, characters, and lives of the people. He attributes the characteristics of the Scotch, as exemplified in such men as John Knox and the Covenanters, to the bleak highlands and the rugged conditions of Scotland. Nature was harsh and stern and relentless as he perceived her manifestations in the cliffs and rocks and sterile lands of Scotland. He found in this remarkable race a reproduction of nature's inflexible form and frowning face.

Be that as it may, the Armenians in many ways reflected their physical surroundings. The noble mountains, reaching into the skies, and the far-reaching plains and the deserts fading into the horizon were ever before them as objects, or subjects, rather, which influenced their lives. They saw in these great works of nature the creative power of an Omnipotent One.

After Christianity had been accepted by them and had become a State religion, they were imbued with the thought that they were the guardians of immortal truth and were to be ambassadors of the risen Lord for the salvation of man. Their literature and art reveal how strongly their lives were influenced by Christianity. Historians refer to the wonderful developments of music and art among the Armenians following the acceptance of the teachings of the Apostles. Mr. Henry F. B. Lynch, in his work upon Armenia, refers to the architectural development among the Armenians and ascribes to them the origin of the gothic style. They erected thousands of churches which exhibited the most beautiful forms of architectural design and testified to the religious devotion and spiritual aspirations of the people.

The Armenians gave attention to education, established schools and seminaries of learning, and applied in their community life those policies and virtues and charities which have demonstrated a high degree of culture among Christian nations. They possessed a respect for the law and established courts which administered justice among the people. Many of the young men of Armenia attended the great centers of learning in Athens, Rome, and Alexandria, and thousands of them found positions of trust and responsibility in the business activities of other nations as well as in the governments to which they went. They became financiers, generals, statesmen, and teachers in other countries than their own. Some of the greatest military leaders of Russia and other near-by nations were Armenians. In the days of the Byzantine Empire many of its emperors and empresses were Armenians, among them being Maurice, Philip, Leo, Basil, Alexander, and Constantine. The Armenians have furnished prime ministers for Persia, Egypt, and Hungary, and they have also filled high administrative positions, even under the Turkish Government. Armenia has furnished the world with brilliant poets and musicians and painters, and has taken high rank in all intellectual fields.

When we recall the vicissitudes through which this noble race has passed and the persecutions and woes which have pursued it for centuries, we can only express wonder at the mighty record of achievement and the imperishable legacy which it has left for the enrichment of the world. Our admiration for the Armenians is increased when we remember the awful conditions which have surrounded them, particularly under Turkish rule.

It is not too much to say that if Armenia had not been invaded and the Armenian race had been permitted to pursue its destiny unmolested by the Tartars and Kurds and Turks, and the Asiatic tribes that were ever at their door, they would have developed into a mighty nation with millions of inhabitants who would have challenged the admiration of the world and been a beacon light to the peoples of the Near East and, indeed, to eastern Europe and western Asia.

If the Christian nations of Europe had given help to Armenia in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, there would have been no Turkish question. The Pan-Turanian movement would have been halted at the eastern borders of Armenia. Greece would have become a mighty nation, and history would not have recorded the centuries of bloodshed and oppression to which the Christian peoples of Greece and the Balkan States have been subjected.

As I have indicated earlier in my remarks, there has not been an understanding by Americans or Europeans of the great contributions made by Armenia to the cause of Christian civilization and to the progress and enlightenment of the world. Many have forgotten, if they ever knew, that Armenia was a well-organized nation administering justice and developing a fine culture at least 1,000 years before any other nation in Europe except Greece and Rome, and that her origin dates back to an earlier period than that of the Roman Empire.

Under the inspiration of the Christian religion the progress of Armenia was phenomenal. During the first two centuries of the Christian era an Armenian alphabet was developed, the Bible was translated into the vernacular of the people, the foreign trade and commerce of the country was increased, and great progress was made in education and culture.

Armenia has given more martyrs to the world in proportion to population than any other land. For centuries her valleys and plains have been incarnadined with the blood of her martyrs.

Under Turkish rule their property has been confiscated, their cities and towns have been burned, hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children have been deported to die of starvation in the mountain fastnesses and in the deserts or to be murdered by the wild and savage bands of Kurds that surrounded them. Their children have been butchered, their daughters and wives have been seized and taken to Turkish harems, and constant efforts have been made to bring about the complete extermination of the race.

Mr. President, at this point, without reading, I desire to place in the Record a few statements made by distinguished writers and statesmen who testify to the fine character and noble qualities of the Armenian people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. KING. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin states that—

The Armenians are a noble race.

Prof. Karl Roth declares that—

The importance of the Armenian people is often ignored. The Armenians have played in antiquity, and more especially in the Middle Ages, an important rôle. As a factor of civilization in the Orient the Armenian is more important than is generally realized. The Armenians are without doubt intellectually the most awake among all the peoples that inhabit the Ottoman Empire. They are superior to Turks and Kurds.

Dr. E. J. Dillon makes the statement that—

The Armenians constitute the sole civilizing, the sole humanizing element in Anatolia; peaceful to the degree of self-sacrifice, law-abiding to their own undoing, and industrious and hopeful under conditions which would appall the majority of mankind. At their best they are the stuff of which heroes and martyrs are molded.

The late Andrew D. White, former United States ambassador to Germany, in his autobiography states that—

The Armenians are a good people, of large and noble capacities. For ages they have maintained their civilization under oppression that would have crushed almost any other people. The Armenian is one of the finest races in the world. If I were asked to name the most desirable races to be added by immigration to the American population I would name among the very first the Armenian.

Lord Bryce, ex-ambassador of Great Britain to the United States, in speaking of the Armenians, declares:

Among all those who dwell in western Asia they stand first, with a capacity for intellectual and moral progress, as well as with a natural tenacity of will and purpose beyond that of all their neighbors—not merely of Turks, Tartars, Kurds, and Persians, but also of Russians. They are a strong race, not only with vigorous nerves and sinews, physically active and energetic, but also of conspicuous brain power.

Henry Morgenthau, ex-United States ambassador to Turkey, in his "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," pages 287 to 289, states:

The Armenians of the present day are the direct descendants of the people who inhabited the country 3,000 years ago. Their origin is so ancient that it is lost in fable and mystery. There are still undeciphered cuneiform inscriptions on the rocky hills of Van, the largest Armenian city, that have led certain scholars—though not many, I must admit—to identify the Armenian race with the Hittites of the Bible. What is definitely known about the Armenians, however, is that for ages they have constituted the most civilized and most industrious race in the eastern section of the Ottoman Empire. From their mountains they have spread over the Sultan's dominions, and form a considerable element in the population of all the large cities. Everywhere they are known for their industry, their intelligence, and their decent and orderly lives. They are so superior to the Turks intellectually and morally that much of the business and industry has passed into their hands. With the Greeks the Armenians constitute the economic strength of the empire. These people became Christians in the fourth century, and established the Armenian Church as their State religion. This is said to be the oldest Christian church in existence.

In face of persecutions which have had no parallel elsewhere these people have clung to their early Christian faith with the utmost tenacity. For fifteen hundred years they have lived there in Armenia, a little island of Christians surrounded by backward peoples of hostile religion and hostile race. Their long existence has been one unending martyrdom. The territory which they inhabit forms the connecting link between Europe and Asia, and all the Asiatic invasions—Saracens, Tartars, Mongols, Kurds, and Turks—have passed over their peaceful country. For centuries they have thus been the Belgium of the east. Through all this period the Armenians have regarded themselves not as Asiatic but as Europeans. They speak an Indo-European language, their racial origin is believed by scholars to be Aryan, and the fact that their religion is the religion of Europe has always made them turn their eyes westward. And out of that western country, they have always hoped, would some day come the deliverance that would rescue them from their murderous masters.

Mr. KING. Permit me to direct attention to a later period in the history of Turkey and the Christians within her borders. Russia declared her intention of becoming the protector of the Christian races in the Near East. The European nations were beginning to learn of the martyrdom of the Christian peoples who lived under Turkish rule. They learned of the barbarous treatment accorded the Armenians, the Greeks, the Bulgarians, the Rumanians, and the Serbians, but were unwilling to protect them if in so doing it required war upon Turkey. Russia's professed desire to mitigate the horrors of Turkish misrule brought but slight alleviation to the suffering Christians. In 1821 Greece revolted and won her independence. Later Serbia and Rumania achieved their independence, and finally Bulgaria threw off the Turkish yoke. Senators will remember that the Russo-Turkish War ended in 1877 and was followed by the treaty of San Stefano, under the terms of which Russia was to occupy a considerable portion of the Turkish territory until massacres and rapine ceased and governmental reforms were put into operation.

Unfortunately Great Britain, fearing the dominance of Russia in the Near East and the possible effect of such preeminence upon her Indian possessions, interfered, and the treaty of Berlin superseded the treaty of San Stefano. The Berlin treaty promised Turkish protection to the Armenians, and Great Britain agreed to help the Turkish Empire in the event of a controversy with Russia. But Turkey, in violation of her solemn pledges, continued her persecution of the Armenian people and of the Christian minorities within her domain. In 1880 the powers joined in a note to Turkey, demanding observance of her promises and an immediate cessation of Armenian and Christian persecution. This demand was wholly ignored by Turkey, and the massacres continued periodically and the promised reforms were denied to the non-Moslem populations of Turkey. In 1894-95 the Sultan, Abdul-Hamid, caused to be murdered more than 100,000 Armenians. In 1908, 700,000 Armenians were destroyed. The awful carnage was continuing when the Christian nations of the world, horrified by wholesale massacres, protested, and secured promises of reform. The young Turks obtained control of the Government, and European nations, as well as the United States, hoped that the promises of a liberal government would be realized. The new régime solemnly agreed that there would be no further enslavement of the Armenians, no further confiscation of property, and a just system of taxation, the rights of the Armenians to be regarded as citizens and to bear arms and to have places in the army and a voice in the administrative affairs of the Empire. But none of these promises were fulfilled.

In 1914 the great World War began. It is difficult to ascertain the number of Armenians then living in Asiatic Turkey. It is estimated by some that there were 2,000,000. Other writers place the number at 2,500,000. Senators will recall that a portion of what had formerly been Armenia had been annexed by Russia and Persia had extended her dominion over still another portion. What is now known as Azerbaijan, which is under Soviet Russia's control, was at one time a part of the Kingdom of Armenia.

When the war broke out there were residing in what is known as Russian Armenia perhaps 2,000,000 Armenians. There were several hundred thousand scattered throughout Asia Minor, and approximately 150,000 resided in Constantinople. Cilicia, which borders the Mediterranean Sea and at one time was a part of the Kingdom of Armenia, and is still known as Lesser Armenia, contained many thousand Armenians, and tens of thousands resided in the Provinces of Broussa and Adin, which includes the Smyrna district. As I have heretofore stated, the portion of what was formerly the Armenian Kingdom constitutes a part of Russia.

At the outbreak of the World War the Armenian people were placed in a most unfortunate and, indeed, dangerous position. Turkey was under the influence of the Kaiser and the military elements surrounding him. After intriguing for some time Turkey joined the Central Empires. German diplomats were in Turkey directing her political movements and German officers were in her armies training and preparing them to support the Central Empires. When Russia mobilized her armies to repel the German and Austrian invasion of her territory the Armenians within Russia entered the Russian armies and rendered heroic service.

The sympathies of the Armenians, both in Turkey and in Russia, were with the Allies. They believed the contest was between democracy and liberty upon one hand and militarism and autocracy upon the other hand. They had struggled for centuries for liberty and realized that so long as the Turkish power existed they would be under the heel of the cruel Turks. However, when Turkey entered the war the Armenians residing within Turkish Armenia endeavored to discharge their obligations to their Government. Thousands of them were drafted into the army for menial service, and many were employed in the construction of roads and bridges and in transporting Turkish munitions and military supplies.

It is difficult to understand just what motives inspired the Turkish rulers to execute the cowardly and cruel purpose which soon became manifest. Authentic reports indicate that German military leaders who were in Turkey, if they did not direct, at least approved the plan for the wholesale extermination of the Armenian race within Turkish territory, or at least within Turkish Armenia.

At the time Turkey entered the war there were perhaps, as I have stated, more than 2,000,000 of Armenians under the Turkish flag. The greater part of them were in the seven Armenian vilayats or provinces, viz, Erzerum, Van, Bitlis, Trebizond, Manvour-et-ul-Aziz, Diarbekr, and Sivas.

The census prepared by the Armenian patriarchate in 1912 shows the Armenians within the provinces just named to have been considerably more than 1,100,000. In addition, there were Nestorians, Greeks, and other Christians, numbering more than 200,000. The number of Armenians in Russian Armenia at that time approximated 2,000,000.

I should have stated that when the young Turks obtained control of the Turkish Government and promised reforms and a mitigation of the persecutions and political and economic discriminations to which the Armenian people had been subjected, the Armenians welcomed these promises and entered wholeheartedly into the plan for administrative reforms and for the execution of policies which would strengthen Turkey, increase her prestige, and augment her prosperity. They showed a loyalty to the Government that was most extraordinary, in view of the centuries of wrongs which had been burned into their very souls. But the new régime soon became more reactionary than Abdul-Hamid and inaugurated a systematic scheme for the Ottomanization of Turkey, which meant the extermination of the Armenian population.

As illustrative of the purpose of the Armenians to aid Turkey in becoming a better and a greater nation, I call attention to the fact that in the Balkan wars the Armenians fought side by side with the Turks against the Bulgarians and other Balkan States. While they regretted war with Christian nations, they observed their obligations to the Turkish Government and fought for its protection. Their bravery and heroism challenged the admiration of their Turkish military leaders.

With the entrance of Turkey into the World War the Young Turk régime, which controlled, conceived the plan of exterminating the Armenians. They had abandoned all pretense of reform and had committed themselves to the policy of Prussianizing Turkey and inaugurating a Pan-Turanian movement. They dreamed of a great Turkish and Moslem Empire controlling the east, allied to a military power—Germany—which would control the west. They planned to conquer Egypt and Persia, and to bring under the political power of the Sultan at Constantinople the Mohammedan forces of the world.

The Armenians were Christians, and they clung tenaciously to the lands of their fathers and to the spiritual and moral inheritance which had come down to them from the past. They had resisted all efforts to bring them under the influence of the Moslem faith. Murder and rapine and persecution had not sufficed to extinguish their faith. Thousands of their children had been seized by the Turks and brought up in Turkish households. The tongues of fathers and mothers had been cut off by the Turks, so that they might not teach their children the Christian faith. Many of their churches had been burned and thousands had been forced to worship secretly in forests and in mountain fastnesses and underground caves. Their cruel masters had subjected them to the most inhuman and fiendish tortures and persecutions, and still the race survived and within the hearts of the people burned that living and inspiring faith that raises humanity to glorious heights.

As I have stated, the Armenians who were subjects of Turkey when the latter joined the Central Empires in 1914 gave no cause for complaint of disloyalty. Many were drafted into the army, and thousands, as I have stated, were employed in the construction of roads and in various activities connected with military operations. No authenticated charge has ever been made of treason by the Armenians to Turkish authority during the war. Various excuses have been offered for the diabolical plan which was devised by the Turkish authorities, and systematically executed, for the extermination of the Armenian race. These pretenses have been carefully examined by Viscount Bryce in his painstaking and carefully prepared volume of nearly 700 pages, which was printed in 1916 under the title "The Treatment of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire, 1915-16."

Let me add at this point that this monumental work demonstrates beyond the possibility of a doubt that the Turkish Government deliberately planned the destruction of all Armenians within the boundaries of the Turkish Empire. The accounts of the frightful atrocities perpetrated by the Turks in the execution of this plan caused a feeling of horror throughout the world. Many in the United States and in Europe could not credit the apparently authentic accounts of the butcheries and premeditated deportations which were being carried out under direction of the Turkish Government. Viscount Bryce undertook to sift the evidence and to assemble documents and facts bearing upon this horrible crime committed by the Turkish Government. He gathered more than 140 documents, and a vast amount of indisputable evidence, which he presented to Lord Grey, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Great Britain. Lord Grey, in thanking Viscount Bryce for the documents "on the Armenian massacres," described them as "a terrible mass of evidence."

In the preface to this exhaustive volume, Viscount Bryce states that—

The record of the rulers of Turkey for the last two or three centuries from the Sultan on his throne down to the district mutessarif, is, taken as a whole, an almost unbroken record of corruption, of injustice, of an oppression which often rises into hideous cruelty. Can anyone still continue to hope that the evils of such a Government are curable? Or does the evidence contained in this volume furnish the most terrible and convincing proof that it can no longer be permitted to rule over subjects of a different faith?

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, who subsequently was a member of the British cabinet, as I recall, of Lloyd-George, in reviewing the volume states that—the evidence here collected with respect to the sufferings of the Armenian subjects of the Ottoman Empire during the present war will carry conviction wherever and whenever it is studied by honest inquirers. . . . It is clear that a catastrophe, conceived upon a scale quite unparalleled in modern history, has been contrived for the Armenian inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire. It is found that the original responsibility rests with the Ottoman Government at Constantinople, whose policy was actively seconded by the members of the committee of union and progress in the Provinces. And in view of the fact that the representations of the Austrian ambassador with the Porte were effectual in procuring a partial measure of exemption for the Armenian Catholics, we are led to surmise that the unspeakable horrors which this volume records might have been mitigated if not wholly checked had active and energetic remonstrances been from the first moment addressed to the Ottoman Government by the two powers who had acquired a predominant influence in Constantinople. The evidence, on the contrary, tends to suggest that these two powers were in a general way favorable to the policy of deportation of the Armenians.

Permit me to add, Mr. President, that since the war further facts have come to light which prove that German diplomatic representatives and German military leaders who were with the Turkish armies not only connived at these massacres and deportations but encouraged them.

Hon. Moorfield Storey, in a letter to Lord Bryce, after reviewing the records submitted, declares that they establish—beyond any reasonable doubt the deliberate purpose of the Turkish authorities practically to exterminate the Armenians, and their responsibility for the hideous atrocities which have been perpetrated upon that unhappy people.

If time permitted, I should like to read from this volume accounts of the deliberate and merciless manner in which the Turkish Government proceeded in the execution of its wicked design. I shall only present one paragraph, from page 627:

There is no dispute as to what happened in 1915. The Armenian inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire were everywhere uprooted from their homes and deported to the most remote and unhealthy districts that the Government could select for them. Some were murdered at the outset, some perished on their way, and some died after reaching their destination. The death roll amounts to upward of 600,000; perhaps 600,000 more are still alive in their place of exile; and the remaining 600,000 or so have either been converted forcibly to Islam, gone into hiding in the mountains, or escaped beyond the Ottoman frontier. The Ottoman Government can not deny these facts, and they can not justify them. No precaution or misdemeanor on the part of individual Armenians could justify such a crime against the whole race.

The cumulative evidence shows that early in 1915 a decree was issued that all Armenians should be disarmed. Those who were fighting in the army were withdrawn and compelled to engage in road building, constructing fortifications, and in other work nonmilitary in character. Soon afterwards orders were issued and executed with methodical precision for the deportation of the male Armenians. No warning was given. They were immediately roped together or driven in groups from their homes in the cities and towns in which they lived into the deserts and mountains, where most of them were butchered. This fiendish plan was carried out in all of the vilayets to which I have referred, as well as in various parts of Anatolia. Some of the Armenians who belonged to the Catholic Church were exempted from the order, but in the main substantially all male inhabitants were deported and most of them murdered by the gendarmerie or by fanatical Moslems or by the wild and irregular bands of Kurds who infested the mountains and plains.

Later the women were ordered deported. Some, under promise of a renunciation of their faith, were permitted to remain. This meant that they were forced into harems or into marriage with some brutal Tartar. Many women and girls were ravished and butchered, and the long lines of deportees driven by cruel gendarmes and Turkish soldiers fell by the wayside and perished in the mountain fastnesses and deserts.

Thousand died of hunger, thirst, and exhaustion. Brigands and outlaws assailed them, murdering some, carrying others into captivity. This horrible picture can not be properly delineated. No language can overdraw it, no words can exaggerate its hideous outlines.

Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, of the United States Army, in 1919 visited many of the scenes of these massacres. He visited Cilicia and from there proceeded to various Provinces of Armenia, among them Sivas, Kars, Erzerum, Erivan, and Tiflis. Members of the mission visited other parts of Asia Minor and obtained evidence as to conditions there prevailing and bearing upon the massacres and atrocities of the Turks.

Under date of October 16, 1919, General Harbord submitted his report to the Secretary of State. It is a strong indictment of Turkish misrule, and corroborates the statements of Lord Bryce and the reports which have come to the United States of the cruelties to which Armenians have been subjected. In his report General Harbord, speaking of the policy of extermination in 1915, refers to it as the "last and greatest of these tragedies." He states that—massacres and deportations were organized in the spring of 1915 under definite system, soldiers going from town to town. The official reports of the Turkish Government show 1,100,000 as having been deported. Young men were first summoned to the Government building in each vilayet and then marched out and killed. The women, old men, and children were, after a few days, deported to what Talaat Pasha called "agricultural colonies," from the high, cool, breeze-swept plateau of Armenia to the malarial flats of the Euphrates and the burning sands of Syria and Arabia. The dead from this wholesale attempt on the race are variously estimated from 500,000 to more than a million, the usual figure being about 800,000.

He further states that the Armenians were—Driven on foot under a fierce summer sun, robbed of their clothing and such petty articles as they carried, prodded by bayonet if they lagged; starvation, typhus, and dysentery left thousands dead by the trail side. The ration was a pound of bread every alternate day, which many did not receive, and later a small daily sprinkling of meal on the palm of the outstretched hand was the only food. Many perished from thirst or were killed as they attempted to slake thirst at the crossing of running streams. Numbers were murdered by savage Kurds, against whom the Turkish soldiery afforded no protection. Little girls of 9 or 10 were sold to Kurdish brigands for a few piasters, and women were promiscuously violated. At Sivas an instance was related of a teacher in the Sivas Teachers' College, a gentle, refined Armenian girl, speaking English, knowing music, attractive by the standards of any land, who was given in enforced marriage to the beg of a neighboring Kurdish village, a filthy, ragged ruffian, three times her age, with whom she still has to live and by whom she has borne a child. In the orphanage there maintained under American relief auspices there were 150 "brides," being girls, many of them of tender age, who had been living as wives in Moslem homes and had been rescued. Of the female refugees among some 75,000 repatriated from Syria and Mesopotamia, we were informed at Aleppo that 40 per cent are infected with venereal disease from the lives to which they have been forced. The women of this race were free from such diseases before the deportation. Mutilation, violation, torture, and death have left their haunting memories in a hundred beautiful Armenian valleys, and the traveler in that region is seldom free from the evidence of this most colossal crime of all the ages. Yet immunity from it all might have been purchased for any Armenian girl or comely woman by abjuring her religion and turning Moslem. Surely no faith has ever been put to harder test or has been cherished at greater cost.

Further on in his report General Harbord refers to the thousands of orphans who were receiving American aid. He states that at the time of his visit 20,000 were being cared for at the expense of various relief agencies in the Transcaucasus, and that 50,000 were receiving Government or organized care along the route traveled by the mission accompanying him. He described the condition of the refugees who had survived and who were found in Transcaucasus as "pitiable in the last degree. They were in rags and 80 per cent suffering from malaria and other diseases." He refers to the statement made by Damad Ferid Pasha, who represented the Turkish Government at the peace conference in Paris in June, 1919, in which he admitted for the Turkish Government the commission of—misdeeds which are such as to make the conscience of mankind shudder with horror forever—and that—

Asia Minor is to-day nothing but a vast heap of ruins.

He mentions the plea that the Grand Vizier made in behalf of the Turkish Empire and his promise of reforms in the government of Turkey and for amends for the crimes committed. A few sentences of the reply of the council to this plea are as follows:

Yet in all these changes there has been no case found either in Europe or in Asia or in Africa in which the establishment of Turkish rule in any country has not been followed by a diminution of prosperity in that country. Neither is there any case to be found in which the withdrawal of Turkish rule has not been followed by material prosperity and a rise in culture. Never among the Christians in Europe nor among the Moslems in Syria, Arabia, or Africa has the Turk done other than destroy wherever he has conquered. Never has he shown that he is able to develop in peace what he has gained in war. Not in this direction do his talents lie.

I have referred to the Russian Armenians. Perhaps I omitted to state that Russian Armenia contains approximately 27,000 square miles within which in 1914 there were nearly one and one-half million Armenians. There were also several hundred thousand in what is known as southern Caucasus, so that in Russia there were approximately 2,000,000 Armenians at the beginning of the war in 1914. Perhaps one-tenth of the entire population was in the Russian Army fighting for the same cause and the same principles as the United States contended for when it entered the contest.

The testimony is uniform as to the bravery of the Russian-Armenian soldiers. Kerensky, speaking of their services, stated that soon after the Turks entered the war their military forces were marching victoriously toward Russian territory, and that while the Russians were preparing for flight the—

Armenians alone stuck to their posts, organized volunteer forces, and by the side of their Russian comrades faced the formidable assaults of the enemy and turned his victorious march into a disastrous rout.

After the collapse of the Russian army, following the overthrow of Kerensky, it was the Armenian soldiers who heroically met the enemy upon the Caucasian front. For six months they held back the Turkish armies and thus materially aided the British forces in Mesopotamia. They also captured Baku and finally joined the British forces at that point in July, 1918. General Ludendorf in his work declares that—the principal factor that forced the breakdown of the German army in the west was due to the lack of fuel supply, because the Turks did not get to Baku in time.

It will be recalled that the military leaders of the Turkish forces withdrew thousands of them from the Palestine front and sent them to the Caucasus to join the Tartars in their military operations against the Russian Armenians.

After the Turkish order for the extermination of the Armenians had been executed, many who escaped joined the English and French military forces in Palestine and Syria and contributed materially to the victory which was won by General Allenby. Thousands of American Armenians, and Armenians who were not naturalized but who were living in America, volunteered prior to and after the United States entered the war, and fought with the American and French and British forces on many battle fields of Europe.

In 1916 M. Briand, who was president of the Council of Ministers in France, proposed to organize a legion, to be known as the Legion of the Orient. Syrians and Armenians in large numbers became members of this military organization; and it was declared that one of the principal objects of the organization was that its members might aid the allied cause and free Cilicia and Syria from Turkish control. Military leaders and statesmen of the allied nations all testify to the valorous conduct of the Armenian and Syrian soldiers and to their material contributions to the allied victory.

For centuries the appeals of the Christian minorities within the Turkish Empire for succor and support have occasionally aroused the civilized world, and, as I have indicated, upon a number of occasions demands were made of the Turkish Government that its massacres and persecutions of the non-Moslem populations should cease. During the war, and particularly after it became known that Turkey had deported and murdered more than a million Armenians, the allied and associated nations, including the United States, demanded that when the war was over the remnants of the Armenian race should be freed from the tyranny of Turkey and that there should be assigned to them a portion of their former kingdom, within which they might establish a government of their own choice.

Lloyd-George stated in the House of Commons that—recognition of the separate claims of Armenia shall constitute one of the aims of Great Britain—

And in July, 1918, Mr. Balfour stated that the British Government was following with—sympathy and admiration the gallant resistance of the Armenians in the Caucasus in defense of their liberties and honor.

He declared, in substance, that the leading statesmen among the allied powers were in favor of a settlement of the Armenian case upon the principle of self-determination.

Clemenceau in July, 1918, said that one of the peace terms must be the—liberation of oppressed nations.

He referred to the—spirit of self-abnegation of the Armenians, their loyalty to the Allies, their contributions to the Foreign Legion, to the Caucasian front, and to the Oriental Legion, called later the Armenian Legion—

And stated that—these contributions have strengthened the ties that connect them with France.

He further declared that—it was the purpose of his government, as well as that of Great Britain, to settle the fate of the Armenian nation according to the supreme laws of humanity and justice.

In the same year the Italian Chamber of Deputies, by a practically unanimous vote, resolved in favor of the independence of Armenia. When M. Poincare was President of France he addressed a letter in February, 1919, to the Armenian archbishop of Cilicia and declared, in substance, that by reason of the—joint sufferings and tribulations of France and Armenia the two countries would now commune with each other with common joy and common pride.

He further stated that—

France understood that Armenia was to enjoy the benefits of security, of peace, and liberty.

Premier Briand in the Chamber of Deputies in 1921 declared that France would fulfill her international duties, not only to satisfy her allies but also her associates, the United States. He was referring to Armenia and the independence which had been promised to the Armenian race.

Mr. Asquith, when prime minister, in a speech on November 9, 1916, speaking of the Armenians, promised—

An era of liberation and redemption for that ancient people.

Lloyd George, in addressing the Trades Union Congress January 5, 1918, declared that—

• • • especially Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine are, in our judgment, entitled to a recognition of their separate national conditions. It would be impossible to restore to their former sovereignty the territories to which I have already referred.

Mr. Lloyd George, in the House of Commons on the 29th of April, 1920, referred to the Christian minorities in Cilicia and stated that the French were to exercise "guardianship over them." He referred to the struggle which was going on and expressed the hope that the Armenians would secure sufficient protection. Continuing, he said:

We can not disassociate ourselves from the responsibility that is cast upon us by our pledges in respect to the Armenians. If the United States of America feel that they can not take direct responsibility, we shall have to consider the whole position and will undoubtedly take our share in the matter of helping the Armenian community to equip themselves for their very difficult task, a perilous task.

I could refer Senators to numerous other statements made by representatives of the allied and associated nations with reference to the guarantees and promises made in behalf of the Armenians, but time forbids.

Permit me to call attention to the statement of President Wilson, appearing in his 14 points:

While the Turkish portions of the Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and absolutely unmolested opportunity for autonomous development.

During the war and following the armistice Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, declared in favor of a free and independent Armenian State, and announced that one of the objects of the war was to redeem the Armenians from the tyranny of the Turkish Empire. A great American, Theodore Roosevelt, in an address delivered by him at the Lafayette Day exercises in New York City, September 6, 1918, said:

Germany has been able to wage this fight for world domination because she has subdued to her purpose her vassal allies—Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria. Serbia and Rumania must have restored to them what Bulgaria has taken from them. The Austrian and Turkish Empires must both be broken up, all the subject peoples liberated, and the Turk driven from Europe.

He referred to Czechoslovakia and Poland and the Baltic Provinces, and declared that their rights must be considered. Speaking of the Baltic Provinces, he said:

They must be granted their freedom and independence.

Again, in this remarkable address, he said that—

Armenia must be free, Palestine made a Jewish State, and the Syrian Christians liberated.

Colonel Roosevelt correctly interpreted the spirit of the American people with respect to the objects of the war and the peace terms which should be written following the triumph of the allied cause.

I distinctly remember that the leader of the Republicans in the Senate [Mr. Lodge] stated in substance that the Armenians must be freed from Turkish rule.

The present Secretary of State, in a speech delivered February 8, 1919, referred to the friendship which the Americans had always entertained for the Armenians and the admiration which they felt for the intellectual alertness and sobriety of the Armenians. He further stated that:

We have revolted at the thought of such a people being under the yoke of the Turk. Now we rejoice that the hour of liberation has come. The vain ambition of brute force has overreached itself and has resulted in the emancipation of the downtrodden and oppressed of centuries. There is to be a settlement of this long account, and the credit balance is to be found in the opportunity for a free and independent life.

The Secretary then referred to the capacity of Armenians for freedom and self-government, and declared that:

We propose to-night to throw such influence as we have into the scale for Armenian independence.

After the withdrawal of Russia from the war the Armenian military units which had opposed the Turkish forces continued the contest until the armistice. In May, 1918, the Armenians residing within what is known as Russian Armenia declared their independence and set up a Republic with its capital at Erivan. Recognition was accorded the new Government by the allied nations as well as by the United States. However, neither the allied nations nor the United States gave material aid or proper moral support to the Armenians in the perilous task before them. The Bolshevik leaders at Moscow sent emissaries to the new Republic to sow the seeds of dissension and followed them with military forces. The Turkish authorities at Angora sent Turkish troops to make war upon the Republic. These forces, cooperating with Bolsheviks and Tartars and Soviet soldiers from Ajerbaïjan, made war upon the Armenian Republic. Left without support by the allied nations and after valiantly struggling for many weeks, their resistance was finally broken down and the brutal and motley forces of the Bolsheviks, Kurds, Turks, and Tartars overran the territory of the Armenian Republic.

Thousands of men, women, and children were butchered; hundreds of villages laid waste, and all the horrors, except on a smaller scale, which had been witnessed in 1915 under the exterminating policy of the Turkish Government, were again reproduced.

Perhaps I should add that after the destruction of the Russian-Armenian Republic the Communist authorities of Moscow permitted the establishment of a Soviet government in Russian Armenia; but it was a mere creature of the Bolshevik leaders and in no sense represents the aspirations and ideals of the Armenians. I record, however, the fact that after it began to function there was less persecution of the Armenians who were within its borders than they would have been subjected to under Turkish rule.

In August, 1920, the treaty of Sevres was signed. While it recognized the independence of the Russian-Armenian Republic, it also provided that a portion of the Provinces of Erzerum, Van, Bitlis, and Trebizond, which were within the limits of the Turkish Empire, should be awarded to the Armenians in order that they might establish a government of their own. It was understood that Russian Armenia in time would be united with the portion of Turkish Armenia over which Turkish authority was extinguished, and that thus a strong Armenian Republic might be established. It was further provided that the President of the United States should delimit the southwestern boundary of the new republic, which he did in November, 1920, and under his decision approximately 42,000 square miles of the four Provinces before mentioned were awarded to the Armenians to constitute a part of their new State.

But even the treaty of Sevres failed to do justice to the Armenians. An important part of Turkish Armenia, to which they were entitled, and all of Cilicia, which is one of the richest Provinces within the Turkish Empire, were awarded to Turkey.

It is important to know that Turkey by the treaty of Sevres recognized Armenia as a free and independent State and agreed to accept the arbitration of the President of the United States upon the question of the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in the vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van, and Bitlis and upon Armenia's rights to access to the sea. At the time of the signing of the Sevres treaty Great Britain, France, and Italy entered into an agreement for the protection of the Armenians and other Christians in Cilicia, which was placed within the French zone. The Armenians had insisted that Cilicia should constitute a part of their Republic, but this claim was denied. However, it was understood that Cilicia would have an autonomous government under the protection of France. There had gathered into Cilicia many thousands of Armenians, Greeks, and other Christians, and they looked forward with faith and hope to the building up of a progressive and enlightened State in which liberty might be enjoyed.

Soon after the execution of the treaty of Sevres jealousies entered into the councils of the allied nations in respect to the Near East. France and Italy were not in accord as to their respective spheres of influence in the Near East, nor were they satisfied with the attitude assumed by Great Britain toward the treaty of Sevres and the obligations of the signatories thereunder. I shall not attempt an analysis of the causes leading to these jealousies and controversies. Perhaps they were inevitable, although I have felt that selfishness and greed influenced the conduct of each nation. However, I do feel free to say that Great Britain more earnestly sought to protect the Christian minorities in the Near East and to preserve the Armenian Republic. She has been criticized because of her desire to restore to Greece territory which formerly constituted a part of Greece and within whose boundaries the Hellenic peoples were predominant. Undoubtedly Great Britain was desirous of building up a strong Hellenic State, and she was likewise committed to the policy of establishing a strong and vigorous Armenian nation. Undoubtedly both Italy and France did not feel that this program was to their advantage in the Near East.

The Armenians had cooperated with France in driving back the Turkish armies and in conquering Cilicia. She had accepted by the treaty of Sevres a solemn obligation to protect the Christian minorities within Cilicia. But after she had signed the treaty she gave notice of her purpose to withdraw all military forces. Terror seized the Armenians and Greeks and the Christian minorities within Cilicia, because they knew that the gathering Turkish forces under Kemal Pasha would subject them to the same fate which had overtaken so many hundreds of thousands of their race.

When the Turks perceived the disunion and jealousies among the allied nations they became truculent and avowed their purpose to ignore the treaty of Sevres, and, if necessary, engage in further military operations. They established a revolutionary government at Angora and began the mobilization of the defeated Turkish armies.

I have referred to their invasion of the territory of the Armenian Republic, in cooperation with the Bolsheviks, the Tartars, and the Kurds, and the slaughter and the indescribable butcheries which followed their military successes. They now directed their attention against the Greeks who inhabited that part of Anatolia bordering upon the Black Sea and which was known anciently as Pontus.

Senators are familiar with the fact that hundreds of years before the Christian era a branch of the Hellenic race had settled along the southern littoral of the Black Sea. They organized a great and powerful State which represented Hellenic thought and Hellenic culture. The Greeks in those remote ages carried their laws and culture and civilization beyond the Greek States and free cities in what is known as Greece proper. Thrace, including Constantinople, was Greek; northern and western Anatolia was Hellenic; the islands of the Aegean Sea were peopled by the Hellenic race, and to the east on the mainland Greek cities and colonies were founded. There Homer was born, and many of the greatest philosophers and statesmen and leaders of the Hellenic race were cradled on the western shores of Asia Minor, in what are now known as the Provinces of Adin and Broussa and the district of Smyrna.

In 1920 there were about 1,500,000 Greeks in Asia Minor and nearly 800,000 in Thrace and the region of Constantinople. There were approximately 1,000,000 Greeks in the vilayets of Adin and Broussa (including Smyrna), the number exceeding the Turkish population within the same territory. In 1914 there were nearly three-quarters of a million Greeks in Pontus and in other portions, not heretofore referred to, of Asia Minor. In 1919, in the vilayet of Constantinople, which comprises Stamboul, Pira, and Scutari, and the suburbs as far as Chatalja, there was a total population of 1,174,000. Of this number only 449,000 were Turks.

In the city of Constantinople there were at that time fewer Turks than there were Christians. In Constantinople proper there were approximately 308,000 Turks and 250,000 Greeks, 140,000 Armenians, 38,000 Jews, and in the neighborhood of 135,000 belonging to other nationalities. There were fewer Turks in western Thrace than there were Greeks and Bulgarians.

I mention these facts for the purpose of calling attention to the justice of the treaty of Sevres, which awarded western Thrace to Greece, and reserved that part of eastern Thrace consisting of Constantinople and a few square miles east of the Chattaqua line for further action by the allied and associated powers.

The government of Constantinople and environs was placed temporarily in the hands of a commission, but it was hoped that this district would be internationalized or placed in the hands of commissioners to be named by the League of Nations or by the allied and associated powers. At any rate, none of the victorious nations or their people conceived it possible that Constantinople would be returned to Turkey or that the Turkish Government would ever be permitted to exercise political authority in Europe. Gladstone had declared in his day that the Turks must be driven from Europe "bag and baggage." I repeat that when the treaty of Sevres was written it was felt throughout the Christian world that the Turk would no longer be permitted to rule in Europe. He had been a cruel, incompetent master. He had failed to do justice to his own race and had been cowardly and cruel in his treatment of other races under his flag.

Former President Taft expressed the views of the civilized world concerning the Turks when he said:

Speaking of the Ottoman Government, it is a lawless form of medieval autocracy, imposed on subject races by pressure from without; sustained by fraud and force; knowing no law; despising justice; alien to every instinct of humanity; deaf to sympathy; and glorying in the shame of the power to injure and destroy.

The Turks, realizing that they were in the minority in Thrace and in Constantinople, accepted the treaty of Sevres, and many of their leaders looked to the establishment of a Turkish capital at Angora or some appropriate place in Anatolia.

The allied nations were entirely willing that the Turk should have a home and a country. They were willing, notwithstanding the fact that there were hundreds of thousands of Christians within the boundaries of Anatolia, to incorporate them within the boundaries of the Turkish Empire and subject them to the rule of the Turkish people. They insisted, however, upon guarantees and reserved to themselves certain authority which would enable them to protect the Christian minorities from oppression at the hands of the Turks.

As I was preceeding to state, when it became manifest that the allied nations were drifting apart and that jealousies were separating them in the administration of Near East affairs, Kemal Pasha and other ambitious Turks began plotting and intriguing to destroy the treaty of Sevres, to further divide the allied nations, and to pluck victory from an admitted inglorious defeat. A rapprochement was made with the Bolsheviks, and material aid was given and promised by the Moscow government in the program which the Kemal government was preparing to execute. May I add that the territory awarded to Turkey under the treaty of Sevres was rich and possessed many advantages as well as almost limitless resources. It was bounded upon the north by the Black Sea; upon the west were the Sea of Marmora and the Straits leading from the Aegean and Mediterranean Seas to the Black Sea. Its area was large—indeed so great as to afford for centuries to come homes for an expanding and growing population. But the defeated Turks planned for an ultimate victory, and responding to the sinister intrigues of the Bolsheviks soon developed grandiose schemes, and sought to embroil the Near East and Egypt and all Mohammedan lands in bitter and relentless war.

Their emissaries, joined by the secret agents of the Soviet Government, penetrated the new Arabian State and Egypt, Afghanistan, and far-off India, seeking to raise the standard of revolt and to precipitate a deadly religious war. France and Italy pursued a course that encouraged the military movements of the Turks. They sold them enormous quantities of military supplies, withdrew their armed forces from territory which they should have protected, and signified a willingness for the Angora government, under Kemal Pasha, to repudiate the Sevres treaty and to light again the fires of war.

In this situation the Turks continued their persecution of the Greeks and Armenians and other Christians who were within Anatolia. Hundreds of thousands of Greeks were deported and thousands of them butchered and subjected to privations and hardships which resulted in death. The history of the treatment of the Potian Greeks is as tragic as many of the pages which record the cruelties and persecutions inflicted upon the Armenians. Tens of thousands of them were driven to Russia, and large numbers, after their homes were pillaged and towns destroyed, succeeded in escaping from their cruel persecutors and finally found their way into Greece or Constantinople or other cities and sections where there was temporary relief at least from the vengeful hand of the pursuing Turk. Thousands of Greeks and Armenians were murdered in Cilicia and in districts to the north and west, and most of the remainder were driven from Turkish soil.

The victory of the allied nations over the Central Empires and Turkey did not change the mentality of the Turks. They remained, and still remain, the same cruel tyrants, the same fanatical persecuting fiends that they have been in the past. There can be no protection for Christians under Turkish rule. So successful were the Kemalists in their schemes that the Greek military forces were driven from Asia Minor.

A great portion of Smyrna was burned, hundreds of thousands of Armenians and Greeks were driven from western Asia Minor, from the Provinces of Broussa and Adin, and were forced to take refuge upon the islands of the Aegean Sea or in Greece, where they are destitute and suffering incredible hardships. Inflamed by these successes, the Kemalists forced the abdication of the Sultan and marched their victorious armies to the very gates of Constantinople. Great Britain sought in an honorable way to unite the Allies in some policy that would bring peace to the Near East and save the Allies from a humiliating and ignoble compact with the Turkish leaders. France, unfortunately, had entered into a separate treaty with the Kemalists shortly after the treaty of Sevres and Italy had signified negatively if not affirmatively her willingness for the Kemal government to engage in military operations, destroy the Greek armies, and reconquer Constantinople. It is manifest that both France and Italy were jealous of Great Britain and were unwilling to see her dominant in the Near East or the controlling power in Constantinople and in the straits. The course of France and Italy, in my opinion, is regrettable, and has brought about the unfortunate conditions to which I have referred.

A united front upon the part of the Allies would have avoided all of these serious consequences. Great Britain indicated a willingness to defend important terms of the treaty of Sevres and to prevent the return of the unspeakable Turk to authority and control in Europe. France and Italy refused their support in the execution of this policy. As a result the Turk, arrogant and insolent, is again in Europe. The Turkish armies have marched through the streets of Constantinople and driven tens of thousands of Greeks from their homes in Thrace. These suffering people have been compelled to abandon their homes and their property and to seek an asylum in the congested lands, overpopulated and impoverished as the result of war and famine, to the south of them. The sufferings of these poor wanderers as they fled before their cruel dispossessioners can not be described. Fleeing through the mountains, thousands of them perished and thousands who succeeded in reaching Greece found poverty and hunger and starvation awaiting them.

The allied nations have capitulated to the demands of the Turks. These demands prove that Turkey has won the war. The great western nations, whose representatives met the cunning Turk at the peace table at Lausanne, discovered that no matter what might be said of Germany or Austria or Bulgaria, it was apparent that Turkey was emerging from the World War as a victorious nation. Her representatives at Lausanne were truculent and were supported by Tchitcherin and the Bolsheviks of Moscow. They demanded terms which, in my opinion, self-respecting nations would not assent to.

The destruction of the Armenian Republic is confirmed and the remnants of the Armenians who were found in Asiatic Turkey are to be expelled. It is true there are but few remaining. The bones of hundreds of thousands of these martyrs lie bleaching upon the plains and in the mountain fastnesses of what was once the Armenian kingdom. The cruel Turk has at last triumphed. It has taken hundreds of years to accomplish his end, but now, with the connivance of Christian nations, he succeeds in driving from the land in which Armenians have lived for more than 2,500 years the few survivors there found. In the centuries since these Asiatic barbarians invaded the homeland of the Armenians millions have been butchered and wrongs and cruelties perpetrated which 10,000 historians can not record. Is it possible that wrong is to triumph and justice to be denied? I am reminded of the biting words of Wilde:

Christ, dost Thou live, indeed, or are Thy bones
Still straightened in their rock-hewn sepulcher?
And was Thy rising only dreamed by her,
Whose love of Thee for all her sin atones?

For here the air is horrid with men's groans,
The priests who call upon Thy name are slain;
Dost Thou not hear the bitter wail of pain
From those whose children lie upon the stones?

Come down, O Son of God! Incestuous gloom
Curtains the land, and through the starless night
Over Thy cross the crescent moon I see!
If Thou in very truth didst burst the tomb,
Come down, O Son of Man and show Thy might,
Lest Mahomet be crowned instead of Thee!

Mr. President, one will be justified in condemning those nations which have permitted Turkey to write victory above her banners. For weeks their representatives, led by Lord Curzon, have been pleading and fencing to secure a treaty from a nation that has practiced the murder of helpless people and waged a war of extermination against Christian races. Lloyd-George, speaking of them and their statements, said:

I remember representatives of Turkey admitting that millions of Armenian Christians have been slaughtered, ravaged, outraged, and tortured. Yet I know of governments that have not hesitated to make agreements with the people who take a leading part in the direction of those outrages and murders.

Mr. President, France and Italy should cower under these stinging words. They cut like a lash. They reveal the selfish, if not imperialistic, policies that have guided some of the allied nations following the treaty of Sevres in their dealings with the Near East and the stricken, sorrowing non-Moslem peoples.

Mr. President, I believe that the majority of the American people felt, even though the Versailles treaty was rejected and we did not enter the League of Nations, that there was an obligation resting upon the United States to aid the Armenians in obtaining their freedom and establishing an independent government. It is true our Government did not declare war upon Turkey and Bulgaria. In my opinion that was a mistake. They were our enemies as much as was Austria, and our military forces were operating against them as they were contending against the forces of Germany and Austria, though, perhaps, there were no points of actual contact. In 1917 I insisted that our Government recognize a state of war as existing between it and Bulgaria and Turkey, and offered a resolution which was a declaration of war against these nations. I contended that if we failed to declare war and no declaration of war came from them, when hostilities ceased we would be denied the opportunity of participating in the peace conference and have no voice in dictating peace terms.

However, as I have shown, the American people recognized, and our Government recognized, that one of the objects of the war was the defeat of Turkey and the establishment of an Armenian Government. The duty rested upon the allied and associated powers to protect Armenia as it protected Belgium and Poland and Czechoslovakia. America failed, in my opinion, to do her duty toward the Armenians. We saw her abandoned by the allied nations and made no protest. Congress was apathetic and heard with apparent unconcern the piteous appeals from the Armenians for the redemption of the promises made by the victorious nations.

The American Committee for the Independence of Armenia, of which the Hon. James W. Gerard is and for several years past has been chairman and Hon. Henry W. Jessup has been secretary, and which has an executive committee composed of some of the most eminent statesmen of our country, including Secretary Hughes, Judge Parker, Elihu Root, Charles W. Eliot, Senators Lodge and Williams, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, and Hon. Edward P. Wheeler, has rendered invaluable and conspicuous service in behalf of the Armenians. This committee for several years has earnestly and faithfully labored to present the cause of Armenia and to compel our Government and the American people to discharge the obligations which they had solemnly undertaken for the protection of the Armenian people.

No praise is too great for the unselfish and noble work performed, particularly by former Ambassador Gerard and Mr. Jessup. No stronger papers have been presented in behalf of a worthy cause than those submitted by these men to the Chief Executive of the United States, the State Department, and to Congress and the American people. I wish time permitted the presentation to the Senate of some of the reports, addresses, and papers prepared by these two distinguished men. However, I shall ask permission to place in the Record without reading a statement found in one of the pamphlets submitted by Mr. Gerard under date of April 14, 1922, in which reference is made to America's responsibility in Armenia's tragedy. While I do not agree with all that is said, I recognize the splendid and logical presentation and gladly offer it for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMERICA'S RESPONSIBILITY IN ARMENIA'S TRAGEDY.

Armenia joined the Allies in the war three years before we did and lost by actual fighting over 100,000 lives. Through the President of the United States we proclaimed to the world that the liberation of Armenia was one of the war aims of America, and later we reaffirmed the President's pledge by a congressional resolution. But we quit the war before we made any practical gesture to bring about the recognition of the rights of a little nation, which had fought on our side and which was no longer able to help itself. We did not forget, however, that the defeat of Turkey, to which we had contributed indirectly, had given us the right to claim, as we now officially do, certain economic advantages in Turkey. But this is not all.

When the peace conference was sitting the Armenians, relying upon the repeated and specific pledges of the allied powers that the creation of an Armenian State would be one of the fruits of victory, had no thought of turning to the United States for aid. They expected that the European powers would carry out both the letter and the spirit of their promises.

Indeed, during the winter of 1918-19 official spokesmen of France made deliberate and persistent intimations to the Armenians that they ask France to take a mandate for Armenia, of which nearly one-half part had already been allotted to France by the secret Sazonoff-Paleologue convention of 1915 and the Sykes-Picot compact of 1916. But our delegation to the peace conference conveyed to the Armenians the clear impression that America was favorably disposed to the assumption of that task. Manifestly it was not for the Armenians to question the constitutional authority of an official body, headed by the President of the United States, ostensibly representing America. That such an impression, amounting to a promise, was given the Armenians was subsequently proved by the fact that the President asked the Senate on May 24, 1920, for authority to accept a mandate for Armenia.

While we rejected the proffered mandate by numerous subsequent utterances, some of them made by our highest officials and others embodied in our national party platforms, we continued to hold out to them the hope that we would help them to become a nation.

When the Armenians turned their faces to us and we, without regard to party, officially and unofficially held out to them the hope that we would help them we actually induced them to relieve the powers from their own responsibility to help them and thereby assumed a fixed and binding moral and legal responsibility to help them to become a nation.

I shall herein below set forth a set of facts which constitute, in my opinion, the bases of our responsibility toward Armenia, a responsibility which we can not shirk without stultifying ourselves. They show that for a continuous period of over three years we have held out to the Armenians the hope that we would help them—we have made solemn promises to help them—and thereby deprived them of the opportunity of looking elsewhere for help.

1. In December, 1918, Senator Lodge offered a resolution in the Senate in favor of the independence of Armenia, and further expressing the hope that "the peace conference—of which America was a member—will make arrangements for helping Armenia to establish an independent Republic." (The peace conference did make the hoped-for arrangement.)

2. On February 8, 1919, at a banquet held in New York, a representative American audience, after having heard Mr. Justice Hughes and Mr. Bryan, adopted Senator Lodge's resolution and cabled it to the President, who replied that "it struck a responsive chord in my heart."

3. On March 3, 1919, 20,000 ministers and priests, a cardinal, 85 bishops, 40 governors, and 250 college and university presidents subscribed to two petitions, addressed to the President, embodying Senator Lodge's resolution.

4. On March 17, 1919, Mr. Bryan cabled the President in favor of the inclusion of Cilicia in Armenia, and the President made a sympathetic reply. (Mr. Bryan suggested that we should keep the President's reply for future use and reference.)

5. During the winter of 1918-19, the American delegation to the peace conference conveyed to the Armenians the impression that America would accept a mandate for Armenia, relying upon which the Armenians refrained from responding to intimations made to them by France that they ask France to accept a mandate for Armenia.

6. On April 22, 1919, 75 bishops, by cablegram, expressed to the President the hope that America may accept a mandate for Armenia, to which the President replied that "You may be sure I share the deep interest in the fate of Armenia."

7. On May 25, 1919, 15 representative Americans, by cablegram, pledged to the President their sympathetic support in the matter of America's accepting a mandate for Armenia, in reply to which the President expressed "our deep appreciation of the trust reposed in us in a matter in which our hearts are very much enjoined."

8. On May 18, 1919, Colonel House assured us that the American delegation was giving necessary attention to the Armenian case and that it was in a satisfactory condition.

9. On May 21, 1919, the United States sent a warning to Turkey against her treatment of the Armenians.

10. On June 22, 1919, eight Americans, including Hughes, Root, Lodge, Eliot, Senator WILLIAMS, and others, by cablegram, urged the President that "either the Allies or America, or both, should at once send to Caucasus Armenia requisite food, munitions, and supplies for 50,000 men and such other help as they may require, to enable the Armenians to occupy the nonoccupied forts of Armenia, within the boundaries defined in the memorandum of the delegation of Integral Armenia"; in reply to which message the President sent the Harbord mission to Armenia.

11. On September 8, 1919, Senator WILLIAMS offered a resolution in the Senate embodying the provisions of the Lodge resolution and, further, advocating the dispatch of troops to Armenia, etc. A subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, headed by Senator Harding, held hearings in September and October, examined numerous witnesses, some of whom had come from Armenia to appear before that committee, but did not make its report to the Foreign Relations Committee until May 14, 1920.

12. In the fall of 1919 the Department of State intimated that the President was favorable to making remedial recommendations to Congress for Armenia, if he could feel that the Republican leaders would support him; whereupon, on December 18, 1919, 10 Americans, including Hughes, Parker, Root, Butler, Hibben, and others, with the full approval of Lodge, asked the President to abandon the proposition of America's accepting a mandate for Armenia—since we were not a member of the league—and urged him that "the administration declare itself in favor of America's extending direct aid to Armenia, and to that end formulate a definite, continuing policy."

13. On April 23, 1920, we recognized the independence of Armenia.

14. On May 21, 1920, the President accepted the invitation extended to him by the allied supreme council to define the southwestern boundaries of Armenia, which he did on November 22, 1920.

15. On May 24, 1920, the President asked Congress for authority to accept a mandate for Armenia. Before the President had sent in his message to Congress we informed him, on the basis of careful inquiries we had made as to the attitude of the Senators, that it would be overwhelmingly rejected, and that its rejection would, in effect, constitute an invitation to the enemies of Armenia to attack her; and after he had sent in his message to Congress we warned the Senators in charge of the resolution in reply to the President's message, and also several other members of the Foreign Relations Committee, that a rejection of the President's request, without a substitute plan for helping Armenia, would be fatal for Armenia, but they did not agree with our conclusion; and thus the steps taken by the executive and legislative branches of our Government, for which the Armenians were in no wise responsible, resulted disastrously for Armenia.

16. In June, 1920, the Republican Party inserted a plank in its national platform which declared that "we deeply sympathize with the people of Armenia and stand ready to help them in all proper ways"; and the Democratic Party inserted a plank in its national platform which declared that "we express our deep and earnest sympathy for the unfortunate people of Armenia, and we believe that our Government, consistent with its Constitution and principles, should render every possible and proper aid to them in their efforts to establish and maintain a government of their own."

17. When Armenia was invaded by the Turks in the fall of 1920 the administration, in reply to our urging that it warn the Turks and the Allies, intimated that it was reluctant to do anything that might embarrass its successor. Whereupon on December 17, 1920, the American Committee for the Independence of Armenia, secured the approval of President-elect Harding to a note to be addressed to the powers, and copy thereof to be transmitted to the Turks, calling upon them to enforce and respect the Armenian provisions of the Sevres treaty, when the President would ask Congress for "such financial, material aid to the new Republic, when put in possession of its rightful territory, as will enable it undisturbed to attain in due time its proper development."

18. In May, 1921, the President expressed himself in favor of the independence of Armenia and of the American people and Government doing their share in the upbuilding of Armenia.

19. In May, 1921, Senator KING offered a resolution in the Senate in favor of the enforcement of the Armenian part of the Sevres treaty.

20. We have in our possession numerous letters written by the highest officials of the Government during 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922, all of which, without exception, favor America's helping Armenia by this or that method.

The major conclusions to be drawn from the foregoing facts are that—
(a) The American people, speaking through their leaders and chosen representatives, made specific and solemn promises to the Armenians, during a continuous period of over three years, that America would help Armenia to become a nation;

(b) Armenia, relying upon the promises thus made by America, refrained from asking the powers to fulfill the pledges which they had made to her, and in one instance turned down a specific offer of help made to her by one of the great powers, and, by so doing, antagonized her;

(c) The United States Government waited for a year and a half to inform the powers and the Armenians of its decision with regard to accepting a mandate for Armenia, and during that period held out to the world the hope that it would take a hand in the setting up of an Armenian State.

(d) The United States Government, after having waited for a year and a half to determine its course on the mandate proposition, in disregard of the warnings which have been given to it that a rejection of the proffered mandate without a substitute project to help Armenia would throw her upon the mercy of her enemies and of those whom she had antagonized by ignoring their offer of help, induced by our promises, made of the Armenia case a football of American party politics, with disastrous consequences to Armenia.

(e) In September-October, 1919, a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings in connection with a resolution favoring measure of direct aid to Armenia, thus holding out to the Armenians the hope of help, and thereby depriving them of the opportunity of seeking help from the powers—a step which would have constituted a gross act of disrespect to the Senate had they taken it—and without any good reason, and notwithstanding the obvious and admitted necessity for speedy decision by the subcommittee, affirmative or negative, waited for eight long months to make its report.

(f) The United States Government, by its failure to inform the powers within a reasonable time that it would not accept the Armenian mandate and by its failure to act within a reasonable time on a resolution—Senator WILLIAMS's resolution, referred to in paragraph (e)—delayed the settlement of the Armenian problem for a year and a half; and the President, who had accepted the invitation of the allied supreme council to define the southwestern boundaries of Armenia on May 21, 1920, by not rendering his decision until November 22, 1920, delayed the enforcement of the Armenian part of the Sevres treaty, which was concluded on August 10, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is well understood that President Wilson deeply sympathized with the aspirations of the Armenians. He was willing that the United States accept a mandate over Armenia. Let me emphasize a fact or two mentioned in the statement just placed in the RECORD. Our distinguished colleague, Senator WILLIAMS, offered a resolution early in 1920, which was referred to a subcommittee composed of President Harding, who was then Senator, and Senators WILLIAMS and NEW, extending congratulations to Armenia upon her independence and "recommending the dispatch of a battleship to the eastern waters and the landing of marines to aid in holding the Batum-Irivan line." A report was submitted, prepared, as I understand, by Senator Harding, which was ratified by the Senate, and it comprehended in its recommendation all that had been declared in the resolution. On the 24th of May, 1920, President Wilson, in a message to Congress, referred to Senator Harding's report and declares that it "embodies his own convictions and feelings with regard to Armenia and its people." He further stated that it was to the American people and their Government that the struggling people of Armenia turned—as they emerged from a period of indescribable suffering and peril, and I hope that the Congress will think it wise to meet this hope and expectation with the utmost liberality.

The President asked for authority to accept a mandate for Armenia, but the Senate Foreign Relations Committee denied his request, and the Senate adopted a resolution refusing the Executive the power to accept a mandate as requested.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in view of the statement as to what has happened to Armenia since the war closed, I suppose the Senator and I ought to feel that we did the right thing when we voted in favor of a United States mandate over Armenia as I remember the Senator and I did vote.

Mr. KING. The Senator is correct as to our attitude upon that matter, and I do not regret that I was one of the 12 Senators who voted to authorize the President to accept a mandate for Armenia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nor shall I ever regret my vote.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, after the allied nations refused to enforce the treaty of Sevres and the Kemalists forces were encouraged, as I have shown, to engage in further military operations, it became apparent to the allied nations that a state of war still existed between them and Turkey, and that some form of treaty must be agreed upon and formally ratified. In the spring of 1921 Lloyd-George, speaking for the allied premiers, submitted proposals as a basis for a revision of the Sevres treaty. One of the proposals called for recognition by Turkey of the rights—of the Turkish Armenians to a national home on the eastern frontiers of Turkey in Asia, delimitation of the frontiers to be decided by a mission appointed by the council of the League of Nations.

This declaration was followed by a memorandum later issued by the foreign ministers of the allied powers which confirmed the proposal for such a national home. This proposition proved attractive to some who were sincere friends of Armenia, but it was evident that the plan was not feasible, and that it would not cure the long-standing evil nor bring relief to the Armenian people. It implied a division of Armenia between Turkey and Russia and the separation of the Armenian people. It recognized as a fait accompli the rightful and permanent assertion of authority by Russia over the Armenian Provinces now controlled by the Soviet Government. It likewise recognized the sovereignty of Turkey over the so-called Turkish-Armenian "home" within which it was proposed that the Armenians scattered in Asiatic Turkey and in Europe would gather. It was a denial of independence to the Armenians and the consignment to the grave of their centuries of hopes and aspirations for freedom and independence.

And, in the meantime, the insolent Turk has continued his plan to destroy the Armenians. He has realized the weakness and impotency of the allied nations to afford them protection or to impose upon Turkey terms of peace which justice and righteousness demand.

And the present administration, regarding the rejection of the Versailles treaty as a mandate to do nothing for Europe or for the Armenians or to discharge those obligations which our association with the allied nations imposed, looks coldly upon all propositions to aid the Armenians in obtaining their liberty and in setting up an independent government. It has refused to even express to the allied nations the deep interest of the American people in the fate of the Armenian race. It has refused to indicate to the signatories of the treaty of Sevres that in so far as that treaty protects the Armenians this great Republic, which has always championed the cause of the oppressed, is profoundly interested in its provisions, and views with deep concern any proposition looking to the modification of such terms and to the denial of freedom and liberty to the Armenian race, whose interests, it was understood, were involved in the World War.

Indeed, Mr. President, our Government apparently looks with unconcern upon the tragic conditions in the Near East. No voice of protest is raised against the deportation of Greeks from Thrace, the burning of Smyrna, the deportation of tens of thousands of Christians from the Smyrna district, and the deliberate execution of the cruel plan to accomplish the extermination of all non-Moslems now within Asiatic Turkey. It is quite likely, in view of this apathetic and calloused spirit, that we will soon be called upon to welcome the Turk into the family of nations, to resume intimate and most cordial diplomatic relations with him, and to accord to him the honors of a triumphant and victorious power. It seems as though but little is needed to complete the humiliation of the allied and associated powers.

Mr. President, the chapter will soon close. It will record the betrayal of a brave and heroic people, the denial of their aspirations, the crucifixion of their ideals, and it will show how great and mighty Christian nations, quarreling over the spoils of war and territorial concessions and spheres of influence, were willing to sacrifice a brave people who had fought with them for world liberty and the cause of civilization. It will likewise portray this Nation, the most powerful in the world—a nation which should exercise the authority of a moral and spiritual leader in the world—as having abdicated its high privilege and taken refuge behind the ramparts of materialism and alleged self-interest.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, much that has been said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is quite apropos of a bill now on the calendar, the bill S. 4092, providing for the admission into the United States of certain refugees from near eastern countries. If it were not so late in the day, and if there was a somewhat larger attendance of the Senate, I would be tempted to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. But because of those conditions I shall not ask it. I hope Senators will give their attention to the bill, with the view on my part of moving its consideration at the earliest practicable time.

I wish to say with reference to the bill as it is now before the Senate, that it is for the relief of Armenian refugees to this country. The original bill introduced by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] provided for the relief of all refugees of whatsoever nationality or racial group that might come from Turkish territory or territory occupied by Turkish troops or Turkish civilian population, and who had been compelled to flee from their homes on account of Turkish outrages. But the Committee on Immigration modified the bill so as to make it apply to Armenians alone. In their inquiry into the subject they found that the Armenians as a race were of that high character so well described by the Senator from Utah. Indeed, Madison Grant, in his book entitled "The Passing of a Great Race," pauses to pay a high tribute to the Armenian people and to their excellent qualities.

In addition to what the Commissioner General of Immigration estimates might be between 5,000 and 6,000 refugees, the bill provides for the admission of 25,000 homeless or orphan Armenian children, in both instances this country to be safeguarded against any adults or children becoming charges. It seems to me that the United States has at least the responsibility of doing that much for the relief of those people.

SPEECH OF EX-GOVERNOR JAMES M. COX.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in 8-point type a speech of former Governor Cox of Ohio, on the occasion of the Jackson Day dinner in Lancaster, Ohio.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as follows:

SPEECH BY EX-GOVERNOR JAMES M. COX AT LANCASTER, OHIO, ON THE OCCASION OF A JACKSONIAN OBSERVANCE, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17.

The principles of our Democracy were written by the same hand that put into form the Declaration of Independence. The great Democrat who conceived them as essential to the perpetuity of free institutions translated theory into demonstration and turned preachment into performance. Under his beneficent rule the borders of our domain stretched to the western ocean, universal happiness grew from the consciousness and advantage of equal rights, and our country made an amazing growth in internal resource and international prestige. When the romance of what was then the western forests felt the touch of the pioneers of our modern civilization and the development of a great empire offered fruitful reward to individual endeavor, human greed asserted itself in the form of enterprises created to feed on governmental preference. But out of the wilderness came another great Democrat, who believed the first duty of government to be the maintenance of the sacred pledge of justice upon which it was founded. What Jefferson conceived Jackson preserved, and under the superb leadership of his honesty and his courage our organization took on a strength that has sustained the faith through the storms of years. Other political parties have come and gone, mere wreckage on the barren wastes of time. The historian writes of their failures rather than of their achievement. They were false to immortal truths.

We profane the underlying sentiment of this solemn occasion unless we pledge our efforts to make the Democratic Party an instrumentality of useful service. In reflecting upon our duty and our opportunity let us see what the present situation is. In the last presidential contest we lost the election, but history will certainly say of that campaign that the circumstances of our defeat were more creditable than the circumstances of the victory registered by the Republican Party. We are proud of the cause we espoused, while the opposition party is seeking to make a closed book of its sloganized misrepresentations. The campaign of 1920 created a very interesting historic analogy. The Whigs came into power as the result of the election in 1840. The contest was a veritable hysteria of hate. Heterogeneous groups had but one thing in common—an implacable dislike for Jackson. The Whig convention presented no platform of principles, for the very controlling reason that the malcontents gathered together could not agree upon a program of legislative or administrative action. They all hated Andrew Jackson, blamed him for the reaction that came from an unprecedented prosperity, and, as the records show, their orators urged "a change." The Whig victory was overwhelming—Jackson's State of Tennessee and Van Buren's State of New York were caught up in the political tidal wave. Confusion in governmental affairs came with the first days of the new administration. Cohesive thought or action was impossible. There could be agreement on no vital question. In 1844 the Whigs were defeated, and the party in a few years ceased to exist. A standard authority says of the movement:

"It was a heterogeneous party composed of diverse and conflicting elements. Its only bond of union was a common desire to gain political power. Had the party been one of fixed political principles it might have made a glorious record. But it was lacking in principles. It was faithful to no program. As a result it accomplished but little."

History repeated itself in 1920, but there was a difference in one detail. A platform in this instance was written, but it was with deliberate care made so ambiguous as to be innocuous, hence it offended none of the groups that followed the Republican standard, and sang together the hymn of hate. They were in agreement in their fancied grievances, and nothing else mattered. Again a plurality quite beyond precedent was recorded against the party in power. No sooner was the change in government made than the country began reaping, for the second time in history, the harvest of impulsive anger. Gestures were made now and then to one element or another, but protest from other quarters soon calmed the waters to a state of perfect tranquillity. There was no agreement at the outset on principles. Except for the element of hatred there was accord in nothing, and quite naturally nothing to speak of has been done. The currents of public opinion are running now against the Republican leaders as they did against the Whigs. There is open revolt in the ranks. Unless present portents are misleading the fate that befell the Whig Party may overtake its successor.

The present public indictment is that general incompetence is enthroned at Washington. We have the President's own official statement that the Congress has passed two measures that would have bankrupted the Treasury except for his own intervention. The executive and legislative departments are equally responsible for a tariff law that is condemned in every community, as a menace to our markets, a subsidy to campaign contributors, and the certain forerunner of industrial troubles. More lamentable is the failure in international affairs. Never since the dawn of civilization have the sons of man been so plagued with conditions that bring disaster to individuals and uncertainty as to the very existence of nations. We have indeed had a World War and the whole world suffers from it! Its awful reactions have spared no nation. The disaster is so widespread that any attempt at piece-meal repair is but a pathetic evidence of national or racial endeavor.

The concerted labors of peoples everywhere are essential, and this is practicable only through governments. What fragmentary fortunes of war there are seem to be with us. We have a commanding gold supply and our agencies of productivity are unimpaired. However, we can not trade with our gold except across the seas, and there can be no trade with prostrate nations. Our fields and factories can produce, but normal production is useless unless we can find a market in which to sell. Our aims in the war were admittedly unselfish. We are not engulfed in the bitterness that has impaired reason elsewhere. Every element is present for a helpful leadership, spiritual and practical. The teachings of every religion tell what any nation so circumstanced ought to do. Every human conscience free from the poison of partisanship is moved by a common prompting, and yet in the sea of international responsibility we drift as aimlessly as a floating derelict. For two years the administration, Micawberlike, has seemingly lived in the hope that something would turn up. Doubtless its philosophy has been that matters could not get much worse and any development might improve the situation.

In the past few months the effort has chiefly been to sustain a theory of justification, and the propaganda reaching to communities has carried the expression often heard from partisans that "after all are we not fortunate to be out of the European mess?" For the time this may carry the intended appeal, but the facts underlying the Turkish imbroglio will in brief season be known. It may surprise some to discover that one of the trails of responsibility leads directly to our State Department in Washington. If we had not abandoned a responsibility assumed during the war the situation in the Near East would not now be so serious. Mr. Hughes's contention that we were not at war with Turkey is an evasion. We were in fact but not in law at war with Turkey. We were an ally of the nations fighting Turkey. We turned munitions over to our allies without question as to where they were to be used. When soldiers from our allied armies went to the scenes of Turkish hostilities our own soldiers took the places they gave up on the western front. Furthermore, one of President Wilson's 14 points expressly dealt with Turkey.

When we abandoned our allies in the forms and tasks of peace the Turk profited by this break in what had been a strong and effective association. But there came a later development, out of which grew a military offensive. Let us see whether anyone in truth can deny our share in the blame. Many years ago civilized powers sought to prevent the shipment of arms and munitions to so-called backward peoples, notably certain tribes in Africa. As a part of the movement we became a party to the Brussels act of 1890, which dealt specifically with this problem. In 1919 it became apparent that the Brussels act was inadequate and out of date, so the peace conference at Versailles drew up the new convention of St. Germain. An able American, Mr. Louis Beer, now deceased, became our representative on the commission. The convention continued a prohibition on arms and munitions shipments to certain African areas and enlarged the scope of the provision so as to take in specified regions surrounding Persia and the Red Sea. It went further and required that all shipments of arms should be given license by the national authority in any country in which these supplies originated. As an added precaution information bearing upon the traffic was to be promptly filed with the League of Nations. Mr. Wilson was unable to submit this convention to the Senate, and not until August, 1922, did our Government officially report its intention not to ratify the treaty. The assembly of the league adopted a resolution expressing the desirability of having the United States submit its objections to the treaty in order that an effort might be made to procure another treaty, one in fact that would meet the American view. So far as known Mr. Hughes has never responded to this suggestion. It will be seen that during this period of uncertainty and confusion there was no interference with shipments of war materials, and the Kemalists equipped themselves for the offensive movement which has resulted not only in an insolent attitude to the world generally but in the slaughter of thousands of men, women, and children as well. Not all of the war necessities were imported by the Kemalists, but most of them were. If this is not another tragedy to be charged against the policy of indifference and aloofness, then I mistake the plain significance of events. It is not unfair to assume that our failure to help create safeguards against an international crisis was directly in consequence of the fanatical policy of having nothing to do with any movement attached in any way to the league, even though the question of our membership was in no way involved.

There is another phase of the Near East situation which will doubtless enter into the public's final analysis. It presents the question of whether the administration's attitude of silence when women were outraged and thousands of adults and children killed squares with the time-honored American policy of protecting religious minorities. Secretary of State John Hay expressed it in a vigorous way when Jews were persecuted in Rumania in 1902. Other precedents are numerous in support of the American theory, which the administration ignores. Such distinguished premiers as Cass, Evarts, Blaine, and Fish felt no restraint in maintaining the Nation's self-respect through plain words to offending foreign authorities. When the slaughter of Christians was at its height, a committee of church ministers called on the President of the United States and urged some official expression of our people's outraged feelings. The Executive is quoted as saying that he did not favor any protest unless we were in a position to back it up. Within a fortnight our Government filed a protest but not in behalf of human life. Instead it was entered to protect oil interests in a part of contested territory.

It is now quite two years since the present national régime was installed. Certainly any public insistence upon a definite international policy can not properly be charged to impatience. The party in control gave three definite pledges.

The senatorial "round robin," formed in opposition to the covenant of the treaty of Versailles, professed a "sincere desire that the nations of the world should unite to promote peace."

The present Executive in his formal speech of acceptance as the candidate of his party declared for an "association of nations."

The committee of 31 leading Republicans, headed by Messrs. Hughes, Root, Hoover, Lowell, and Taft (Henry), in its appeal favored bringing "America into an effective league to preserve peace * * * by frankly calling upon the other nations to agree to changes in the proposed agreement which will obviate the objections now the subject of dispute."

To use a popular yet a comprehensive phrase, Is it not time for a show-down? Does the senatorial group believe that a promise to America on a most solemn matter is to be regarded as having no binding responsibility? Is the President not ready to report on the structural plans for an association of nations and at the same time advise his countrymen what steps have been taken to assure cooperation from abroad? The committee of 31 certainly did not assume to speak without the knowledge and consent of the candidate who, if elected, would possess in his official status the constitutional right to "call upon the other nations to agree to changes in the proposed agreement." Has the committee of 31 performed its part of the trust? It may be that the signers of the round robin, the members of the group of 31, and the President himself—all may have departed from their announced positions. If so, then in frankness their revised plans, if they have any, should be given to the public. If, on the other hand, they are without program or suggestion, a candid admission will reflect credit upon them. No one need fear either an accusing conscience nor the disrespect of his fellows by expressing an honest conviction.

Mr. Hughes very recently said that the question should be taken out of politics. No one questions the wisdom of this course, nor is any useful purpose served by any elaborate reminder to Mr. Hughes that the Republican senatorial conspiracy put it into politics at a time when the Nation's endeavors were purely nonpolitical. These are stressful times, and public officials in their arduous responsibilities deserve public cooperation so long as good faith is shown. The administration has forfeited the people's confidence because it has stubbornly held to views that common sense defied. Our people are tired of following a leadership that neither leads nor gets anywhere. The betrayal of the civilized powers in the St. Germain affair is followed now by the obstinate refusal to cooperate with the Reparation Commission. When the French-German crisis approached the administration met widespread criticism with the observation that we were not properly represented on the Reparation Commission. The Robinson resolution, providing the very thing Mr. Hughes said we lacked, was at once presented in the Senate, only to be met with Mr. Hughes's objection that its adoption now would be untimely. When positive action is proposed for remedial purposes there invariably comes a hint from the administration that something else is under way, but it never materializes. Can there be any more effective device to wear out the patience of a forbearing public?

Mr. Hughes will render a conspicuous service if the pressing problem of our international relationship is removed from politics; but if his labors are to be fruitful, he must bestir himself. Within another year we will be on the very threshold of another presidential contest. I most earnestly hope that solution will be so far under way that this subject matter of such widespread concern can not be thrown into a political campaign. I feel assured that the American people will not be hairsplitting in their consideration of details. They realize now from the bitter lesson of experience that we are a part of an economic unit that involves the markets, the human activities, and the well-being of our civilized world. We can not cut ourselves from it and thrive. Profound statesmanship is not so much the element necessary to a proper adjustment of our international affairs as are common sense and a disposition to forget fetish and any false pride in sponsorship of things behind us. If Mr. Hughes will forget his politics, strip himself of all thought of the alliances made in 1920 to win a partisan victory, and take a position determined by the single thought of serving humanity, he will save the world. We should be reminded that Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell in England made their places in history by forsaking the corn laws which they had espoused. Changed conditions justified their course. They may have been moved by the thought of Emerson that—

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines.

Mr. Hughes should sanction without delay the congressional proposal to vitalize our participation in the affairs of the Reparation Commission. America should then, through her representative, bring about an economic survey of Germany. The suggestion of turning the problem over to a committee of bankers is putting the cart before the horse. Obviously, economic experts, including bankers, would serve in the survey, but as subordinates to the Reparation Commission their report would not only be presented to the public opinion of the world but it would be a base for action by a legally created body that has powers. Let us illustrate the point in this way: If a group of international bankers conducted an analysis, its conclusions would become merely a public document. It would be a process much like the gathering of evidence in a court trial without submitting it to either judge or jury. It would be but another development lacking the virtue of positive action.

The time is here for action. The fate of the world is imperiled and time is of the essence. If the Reparation Commission, on the other hand, makes its inquiry, and it can, as efficiently as the suggested international bankers possibly could, then the detail of procuring the facts will have been completed and the facts can go to the Reparation Commission—a body with power to act. The world wants the truth and action based upon the justice which truth would render clear would sweep away the rubbish of petty controversy. In these circumstances, if Germany refused to accept the award of the Reparation Commission, she would deserve no sympathy and get none. If all parties in interest except France were to accept it, then she would be an outlaw nation, because she would be regarded as having rejected the decree of a tribunal she had helped to create—a tribunal whose decisions she had pledged herself to respect. She is no way committed to any finding that might otherwise be made on reparations.

But if Mr. Hughes continues trying to strait-jacket the soul of America and if the administration goes on drifting, then what? In that contingency, this great question unavoidably becomes more of a political issue than it has ever been before.

When this comes, if it does, what will be the duty of the Democratic Party? Let us address ourselves seriously to this thought. We hear it said that the question was settled in 1920, and that a mandate was spoken against our entering the league. Let us see whether the facts justify that contention. Three distinct groups voted against our ticket because of purely racial grievances, untold thousands voted against us because of heavy taxes, others were controlled by a discontent growing out of internal war measures. Republicans in every community accepted in good faith the assurance of the committee of 31 that the surest way to get into the league was through the suggested compromise plan of the Republicans rather than by adhering to what was designated as the unyielding Democratic position. These votes more than made up the Republican plurality, and yet they were not directed against our membership in the League of Nations. The claim obviously falls before the facts.

Now, for the sake of argument, let us assume that a plain mandate was given. If so, was the mandate for the association of nations that the Republican candidate promised to create, or the League of Nations amended as Messrs. Hughes, Root, Hoover, Lowell, Taft, and others proposed? Since we have procured neither the amended covenant of the league nor the association, is it safe to assume that the people will just let the matter drop? If there was a mandate against the Democratic plan, then certainly the suggested Republican alternative was sanctioned. There is no escape from this conclusion. At all events, the matter stands just as it was two years ago. If any Democrat believes a verdict was registered against the league and that it should be accepted as conclusive, what about the tariff? We have been defeated in the past on that issue, but did the Democracy give up the faith? On the contrary, we continued to reaffirm it, and did so in 1920, while the Republicans stood for a protective tariff. Are we to accept the present tariff monstrosity as the expressed preference of the people, or will we renew the fight in 1924?

The condition of things in the world clearly makes an issue, and under our system of government if the contingency described arises this issue will be discussed in the same manner that vital questions always have been in this country. Certainly the points at issue are being clearly drawn. The world is slowly but surely drifting to a state of horror. When the war closed a going concern, the League of Nations, was formed to substitute reason for force. Nations bound themselves together in agreement to go to conference rather than war, and to put an end to the system of secret treaties that had plagued civilization. It is the only organized movement for this specific purpose. Men criticize it, but they have no substitute, either in created or creative form. The proposed Republican alternatives presented in the campaign of 1920 have come to naught. We must enter into some international arrangement or remain in isolation. There is no middle ground. Since those who suggested other plans have abandoned them, common sense opens the only avenue of service—service not only for Europe but ourselves as well.

You hear at times the partisan observation that the treaty of Versailles is responsible for the present confusion. Most treaties following severe wars have taken on some of the spirit of bitterness. They are concluded before the cooling-off process takes place. We need not go outside our own history to find where the element of hate brought on the awful days of reconstruction in the Southern States—an enforced cruelty that no one now even attempts to justify. If Lincoln had lived, it would not have occurred. Each day, because time heals wounds and softens asperities, would have helped to make his creed of "malice toward none and charity for all" an accomplished fact.

When the treaty of Versailles was concluded, even as strong an advocate as General Smuts, the eminent South African statesman, said that there were terms in it that ought not and could not be enforced. The time had come, however, bringing with it the dangers of starvation and disorder, when a start had to be made in organizing and administering the new order. We must not lose sight of the important fact that the treaty was assigned to the League of Nations, a body having elastic powers, rather than to an international court. The court would have accepted it as a decree to enforce. The league, on the other hand, possessed the discretionary right to act as developments suggested. Is it not true that chartered constitutions, laws, and regulations are refined in part by the sensible manner of their enforcement? Even courts in their liberal view of public policy have not interfered. Men of the type of Wilson, Smuts, Gray, Cecil, and others doubtless looked to the machinery of the League of Nations to work out the solution of problems as they arose, having in mind that accruing time would make the task easier. What Lincoln would have meant to the reconstruction of the American Union the League of Nations, in its administration of the treaty of Versailles, would have been to the reconstruction of the world.

The Reparation Commission, for instance, was clothed with broad powers. An outstanding virtue to the plan was the provision for American membership in the league. We were not infected with the bitterness that possessed Europe. We were asking for neither territory nor indemnity. Our good faith was recognized even by the vanquished nations. Our judicial attitude would at once have established our moral and constructive leadership. But America did not go into the league. At the very beginning of things we were separated from the whole enterprise. European nations were soon at each other's throats, and the golden opportunity for a service that would have had no historical precedent was lost. We are not in the International Court of Justice, nor have we any useful relation to anything that is going on in Europe. It is true that we have observers, engaged in the job of snooping around and making themselves and our Nation ridiculous in the view of the world. The reparations tangle could have been adjusted, but by America and America only. Last summer every national interest in Europe desired our offices of mediation. A peculiar psychology made it possible for our Government to successfully intervene. At that time an economic survey of Germany's condition would have been welcomed by the powers in interest. Obviously then, as now, it was not a question of what Germany ought to be made to pay but how much she could pay and live. Chancellor Wirth in Berlin said that Germany would gladly subject herself to a careful economic examination, provided it was made under the impartial auspices of American leadership. He went so far as to say that Germany desired to enter the League of Nations when America did, but not before, for the reason, as he advanced, that under other conditions German membership would only mean her subjection to what was characterized by him as "the ruling intolerant bitterness of Europe."

The right to remain an active member of the Reparation Commission was never impaired, but the administration at Washington has not availed itself of it. Mr. Hughes, instead, had another plan—again it was to be something different. It failed in the "borning" and now the march of French troops is on German soil. Credits are affected. Upon our markets will fall another chill. Our farmers, now borrowing millions of dollars to meet losses already sustained, will face another unprofitable season, and every home, in city and country, will have a quickened appreciation that a divine agency made us a part of the world and no human device can change the order of things.

Now, assuming that the administration will not settle this question—then what will we as Democrats do? What would Andrew Jackson have done in like circumstances? What did Jackson do when France violated her treaty with us, and even Clay, Webster, and Calhoun denied him congressional appropriations for the adequate maintenance of our self-respect? The timid said he should delay matters. He went forward and France settled. What did Jackson do when the franchise for the Federal bank was to be renewed or rejected? The timid, even in his cabinet, said he should go slow, but he went forward and crushed the monster menace. What did Jackson do when the Government funds were to be taken from the Federal bank? The timid again, even in his cabinet, urged postponement in order to avoid a panic. He went forward. The bank was closed, and when the Whigs later tried to resurrect it, John Tyler, the Whig President, recognized that Jackson was right, and twice vetoed the bill.

What would Andrew Jackson do now? He would follow the path which his clear vision always blazed for him, the path of duty. He would establish relationships with the nations of the world in order to save humanity. Recognizing the futility of waiting longer for alternatives he would ask America to join the only operating concern created for this critical need—the League of Nations. He would impose such conditions as would befit the dignity of our country and harmonize with the composite public opinion of our people. Andrew Jackson never retreated when duty faced him. He was unschooled in the art of retreat. A solemn duty confronts the Democracy now and we must not retreat.

INDIANS OF THE MESCALERO RESERVATION.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I will yield to the Senator if the bill he desires to call up will involve no debate.

Mr. BURSUM. If it does I shall not press its consideration. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6294) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico.

A bill similar in substance passed the Senate last September, appropriating $250,000 to be advanced to the Mescalero Indians and to be repaid out of the sale of timber. The House passed a different bill, on the same line and for the same purpose, but did not pass the Senate bill. The House bill is different in that it simply authorizes the appropriation. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000 for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico, to be expended or distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under such regulations as he may prescribe; to remain available for a period of five years from the date of the enactment of this act, and to be reimbursed to the United States from the sale of timber on said reservation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, January 27, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH COSTA RICA.

In executive session this day the following treaty was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. Lodge, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit an extradition treaty between the United States and Costa Rica, signed at San Jose on November 10, 1922, and, for confirmation by the Senate, copies of notes exchanged between the American minister at San Jose and the Costa Rican Minister for Foreign Affairs, by which assurance is given on the part of the United States that the death penalty will not be enforced against criminals delivered by Costa Rica to the United States for any of the crimes enumerated in the treaty, and that such assurance is, in effect, to form part of the treaty and will be so mentioned in the ratifications of the treaty.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, in which it is explained that a precedent for this course is found in the case of the extradition treaty between the United States and Portugal in 1908, where like notes were exchanged and were confirmed by the Senate.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 20, 1922.

The PRESIDENT:

By its resolution of February 22, 1922, the Senate advised and consented to the ratification of the treaty of extradition signed between the United States and Costa Rica at San Jose on January 21, 1922. The treaty was amended by the Costa Rican Congress by the insertion of a supplementary article providing as follows:

"The delivery of a person by the Republic of Costa Rica in virtue of this treaty will be made under the condition that capital punishment shall not be applied to the criminal."

This Government was unable to agree to this modification, but the American minister at San Jose was instructed to indicate this Government's willingness to effect an exchange of notes similar to that which followed the signing of the treaty of extradition between the United States and Portugal in 1908, as set forth on pages 1475 and 1476 of the compilation entitled "Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols, and Agreements Between the United States and Other Powers."

This course being agreeable to the Government of Costa Rica, a new treaty, in substitution of the treaty of January 21, 1922, was signed at San Jose, and the exchange of notes mentioned made on November 10, 1922. This treaty of November 10, 1922, being word for word the same as the substituted treaty of January 21, 1922, the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, together, for the Senate's confirmation, with copies of the notes exchanged at the time of its signature between the American minister at San Jose and the Costa Rican Minister for Foreign Affairs, by which the understanding is stated on the part of Costa Rica, and the assurance is given on the part of the United States that the death penalty will not be enforced against criminals delivered by Costa Rica to the United States for any of the crimes enumerated in the treaty, and that such assurance is, in effect, to form part of the treaty and will be so mentioned in the ratifications of the treaty.

In its resolution of May 22, 1908, giving its advice and consent to the ratification of the extradition treaty between the United States and Portugal of May 7, 1908, above mentioned, the Senate stated its understanding "that it is agreed by the United States that no person charged with crime shall be extradited from Portugal upon whom the death penalty can be inflicted for the offense charged by the laws of the jurisdiction in which the charge is pending, and that this agreement on the part of the United States will be mentioned in the ratifications of the treaty and will, in effect, form part of the treaty."

A similar confirmation by the Senate of the notes exchanged at the time of the signature of the Costa Rican treaty is necessary.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 19, 1922.

The Republics of the United States of America and of Costa Rica, desiring to assure the prompt and efficient action of justice in punishing delinquents who attempt to escape the penalty prescribed by the laws of one country by taking refuge in the other, have resolved to conclude a treaty of extradition. For that purpose they have named as their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Mr. Roy Tasco Davis, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America in Costa Rica; and

The President of the Republic of Costa Rica, the Secretary of State in the Office of Foreign Relations, Señor José Andrés Coronado Alvarado;

Who, after having mutually communicated their full powers, and they being found in good and due form, have stipulated as follows:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Costa Rica shall, upon mutual requisition duly made as herein provided, deliver up to justice any person who may be charged with, or may have been convicted of, any of the crimes specified in Article II of this convention committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties while said person was actually within such jurisdiction when the crime was committed, and who shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other, provided that such surrender shall take place only upon such evidence of criminality, as according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense had been there committed.

ARTICLE II.

Persons shall be delivered up according to the provisions of this convention who shall have been charged with or convicted of any of the following crimes:

1. Murder, comprehending the crimes designated by the terms of parricide, assassination, manslaughter, when voluntary, poisoning or infanticide, as well as the attempt to commit these crimes.

2. Rape, abortion, carnal knowledge of children under the age of 12 years.

3. Bigamy.

4. Arson.

5. Willful and unlawful destruction or obstruction of railroads, which endangers human life.

6. Crimes committed at sea:

(a) Piracy, as commonly known and defined by the laws of nations or by statute;

(b) Wrongfully sinking or destroying a vessel at sea or attempting to do so;

(d) Assault on board ships upon the high seas with intent to do bodily harm.

When the offense charged comprises the act either of murder or assassination or of poisoning, either consummated or attempted, the fact that the offense was committed or attempted against the life of the sovereign or head of a foreign State, or against the President of either of the signatory Republics, shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain that such a crime or offense was of a political character, or was an act connected with crimes or offenses of a political character.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Bishop William F. McDowell offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, wilt Thou draw near to us and bless us as we undertake to-day's work in the name of the great worker for good in all the world. Grant to guide us in the way of truth and of righteousness and of human sympathy, and help us to do those things that will be good for the world. May we always remember our place as the servant of mankind, and may the Nation, whose we are and whom we serve, render its large service to the world to-day. Let Thy special tenderness and kindness abide with the Chaplain of this House as he sits in grief and loneliness. Pour back into his own heart something of the kindness and sympathy that he always poured out of his heart. And with him and with all Members of this body who carry great sorrows of any sort wilt Thou constantly abide. Hear us in our morning prayer, be with us in our work, and guide us always. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

VALIDATING BANK TAXES.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the papers in reference to the bill H. R. 11939, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to take from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference on the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 11939. An act to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not get the whole statement as to the amendments. I understand this is a bill validating national bank back taxes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman I realize how important this is to the gentleman's State and the State of Massachusetts and several other States, with a view of harmonizing and getting a correction of the law, and realizing that his State and some of the other States are particularly interested in our permitting validation, I can assure him and the other Members of the House that the conferees will give the House an opportunity to vote on the validating clause in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. That will be very satisfactory so far as our State is concerned.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Reserving the right to object, as I understand the gentleman there will be no attempt, or will the House conferees be in accord with the Senate conferees as to the main part of the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Of course, I can not bind the conferees, but I believe I can say to the gentleman that we will be in accord. We have had, I can say, an informal discussion of this matter, and I can not see any disagreements concerning the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, I do not want a misunderstanding of the gentleman's statement to be in the mind of the gentleman from New York. Of course, I have no quarrel with my friend from Pennsylvania, but I, as one of the conferees, do not want the impression to be left that the House conferees are going to violate the judgment of the House by agreeing to any part of the Senate amendment. We are going into a full, free conference, subject to the agreement I understand the gentleman has made, that before final settlement of the so-called validation amendment the House will be given an opportunity to express itself upon that.

Mr. ANDERSON. With that statement I think I shall have to object to the conference at this time.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman does not want any legislation, the responsibility is on him.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter can be adjusted. I do not think there is any real disagreement. What is insisted upon is that before the conferees have finally agreed upon the bill as a whole the conferees will return to the House and give the House an opportunity to pass upon the question of validation.

Mr. WINGO. I do not object to that. But I do not want anybody to think that I, as a conferee, am bound to agree to any part of the Kellogg amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. I agree with what the gentleman from Wyoming has just said; that is exactly the position. I do not want to give the impression to the House, however, that I am in favor of that members of the conference committee are in favor of the validating clause.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that it is necessary for any one to express any opinion on the matter one way or the other. All the House desires is that before the conferees reach an agreement the House shall have opportunity to pass on the question of validation. I think we all understand that, and it ought to be stated.

Mr. ANDERSON. This proposition is not quite on all fours with some matters that come up before the House on the basis of the consideration of Senate amendments. This bill is on the House Calendar; it can be called from the Speaker's table, and the House can proceed to consider the Senate amendments without sending the bill to conference, so that the matter does not stand on the same basis, for example, as an appropriation bill. There are some of us who are interested in the Senate amendment as proposed. I hesitate somewhat to surrender the right which I think we have to call for a vote on the Senate amendment in order to send this bill to conference if it is understood that the House conferees are going to adhere to the position which the House took originally on this subject.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, what the gentleman is thinking about is the dispute over the terms or the language of the validation provision. Is that what the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. ANDERSON. Primarily.

Mr. WINGO. Now the difference between the two is simply whether or not we shall accept one of the Senate provisions on validation, which would authorize the legislative veto of a judicial decision. I will say frankly to the gentleman that if the House wants to vote on that I shall have no objection, but I will never agree to such a provision permitting a legislative veto on a judicial decision. I will not agree to that. I think the better course would be to pursue the course suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]; let it go to conference. The gentleman has assured you that you will have a vote on that proposition. If that is what you want, all right.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I can not understand what is going on, and I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the conference report. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report, to the request that it be taken from the Speaker's table and sent to conference?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the other provisions of the bill are acceptable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. McFADDEN, Mr. DALE, and Mr. WINGO.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 13481, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

SYDNEY ANDERSON,
WALTER W. MAGEE,
EDWARD H. WASON,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
GORDON LEE,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural appropriation bill as it passed the House carried a total of $69,068,053. As it passed the Senate it carried a total of $73,741,653, an increase of $4,673,600. If the House accepts the recommendations of the managers on the part of the House, the bill for 1924 will carry $69,536,653, an increase over the amount recommended by the House of $468,600 and an elimination of amendments in the Senate carrying $4,205,000.

I shall take up in detail only three or four amendments which the conferees considered and on which they have come to an agreement. The first of these items is Senate amendment No. 7, relating to the eradication of the barberry, on which the Senate increased the amount of $350,000, carried by the House bill, to $500,000. The conferees have agreed upon a total amount of $425,000; $125,000 of this sum contingent upon contributions by States, counties, municipalities, and other organizations of an equal amount.

On the European corn borer the Senate increased the amount of $200,000, carried in the House bill, to $250,000, and the conferees have agreed upon $225,000.

On the item for the control of the white-pine blister rust the Senate increased the amount carried by the House from $200,000 to $250,000, and the House recedes from its disagreement to that amendment.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I see on page 4, under Senate amendment No. 23, the House conferees agree upon $700,000 for the market news service, instead of $426,400, as proposed by the House. Do I understand this will take care of the news service in the country?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know that I understand exactly what the gentleman means by that, but what it is contemplated that the amendment will do is to extend the existing service to portions of the country not now covered. It does not include any service which is not now undertaken under this item.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The reason why I asked the question is that the Southeastern States at the present time have not the service that the other sections of the country have. This will extend the service to the entire country?

Mr. ANDERSON. This will extend the service to the entire country, including the Southeastern States.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. No agreement has been reached on the maximum salaries?

Mr. ANDERSON. No agreement has been reached on that.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the gentleman in mind the idea of discussing that after he gets through the report?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. We will take up the amendments serially.

Mr. HAUGEN. You have no objection to indicating the position of the conferees?

Mr. ANDERSON. I expect to move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. That will increase the salaries of these 3,750 scientists about $7,500,000?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I will explain that in a moment.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I have to-day introduced a House concurrent resolution requesting the President of the United States to call a joint peace conference. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to raise my voice for peace. I am to-day introducing a resolution providing for the appointment of a congressional committee to call upon the President, requesting him to call a world peace conference.

While I think there is no doubt about the sentiment in this country, that it is overwhelmingly opposed to the United States ever again entering European entanglements, in my judgment there is no power on earth that could keep the United States out of war if another world war is allowed to come.

Civilization is approaching danger. A fight is brewing on the international world campus. The United States is opposed to that fight. If it is to be stopped, it must be now. We must not sit supinely by and allow civilization to go on the rocks. The lives of your boy and my boy are at stake. Let us act vigorously and act now.

The following is a copy of the peace resolution:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 26, 1923.

Mr. CHALMERS introduced the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

House concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a congressional committee to call upon the President of the United States to request him to call a world peace conference.

Whereas European nations seem to be rapidly drifting toward war, and although the sentiment of this country is overwhelmingly opposed to our entering another world war, nevertheless, if war comes, probably no power on earth can keep this country out; and

Whereas the European nations are too close to get the proper perspective and the danger seems too real to them individually to view the situation reasonably; and

Whereas the United States is far removed and is universally held as the unselfish, impartial, and unprejudiced friend of all peoples working to stabilize civilization:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a congressional committee of 10, 5 from the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and 5 from the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, call upon the President of the United States to request him to call a conference of leading world powers to consider and work out a specific plan for world stabilization, and that the President of the United States formulate the agenda for said conference and issue the call in the name of the people of the United States of America.

I also want to call your attention to the following resolution adopted by the council of the city of Toledo:

Whereas international relations in Europe at present are such that a renewal of the World War appears imminent; and

Whereas it appears that the United States is in a position to, and should, assume the leadership in making plans to place the world on a basis of political, financial, and economic sanity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the council of the city of Toledo, State of Ohio, that President Harding should call a conference of leading world powers for the purpose of taking up economic problems, reparations, debts, limitations of land and sea armaments, and working out a specific plan for world habilitation, all compatible with existing agreements between the United States and other countries; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of council be, and he is hereby, directed to send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States of America.

I quote editorials from one of my home papers, the Toledo News-Bee:

DO YOU WANT TO KEEP THE UNITED STATES OUT OF WAR?

Every day conditions in Europe are growing worse. Nations great and small are tottering, unable to pay expenses. Suffering among the peoples is increasing. Famine threatens here and there. Unemployment is growing. A sort of suicidal desperation—a don't-care-what-happens mood—has settled down over half the world. Say "Boo!" and a new world war will start which by comparison will bleach the red horror of the last one. And if such a blaze is started, it will sweep everything before it—us along with the rest. Some of us honestly think we could "keep out." Impossible!

Yet we stand around and do nothing to stop it.

They say the time to convert a hardened sinner is right after he turns the corner of a dangerous illness but while he is still in fear of a relapse.

One of these days, if we are lucky, the present crisis in Europe may ease off a bit. Sobered over its narrow escape, the world may then be in the moment's mood for salvation.

Then will be the time for the United States to be ready with a plan to offer as a basis of world sanity—political, financial, economic. If it is not ready with such a plan then, it should forever after hold its peace.

"Plan? Plan? Have you anything constructive to offer?" That is the reply of our Government—Congress, the President, the State Department—when asked if we as a Nation have any plan or policy. They confess they have no plan; no policy.

Criticize? Oh my, yes! Say what ought not to be done? Washington officialdom is chock full of those ideas. But of anything constructive, never a word.

So one is offered by this newspaper. It is not pretended to be perfect. But it does contain the nucleus of an idea, perhaps a basis to work from. It is at least something, instead of nothing.

THE PLAN.

1. The United States must assume the leadership.
2. At the first possible opening, President Harding should call a conference of the leading World War powers.
3. The program at this conference should be in two sections:
 - I. Economic problems, reparations, war debts.
 - II. Limitation of armament—on land, on sea.
4. Instantly the conference is called to order, America's spokesman should lay before the assembly some specific plan of world rehabilitation. This might follow somewhat these lines:

SECTION I.

A. A general moratorium on reparations and war debts, so that no payments of principal or interest need be paid for from three to five years.

B. Full American participation in a reparations commission, which, freed of politicians and soldiers and guided by economic experts, should fix the amount Germany can pay, not what she ought to pay.

C. Germany should know that until this amount is paid in full France, under allied supervision, will remain on the left bank of the Rhine.

D. An international loan to Germany; part to go to France to help tide her over the next few years, the balance to be used to stabilize Germany's finances.

E. Willful default on the part of Germany to be met by sanctions as provided for under the treaty of Versailles.

F. The United States and Great Britain to agree to aid France in the event Germany attacked her without provocation. (Absolutely safe, since Germany would never attack France without provocation as long as such an agreement stood.)

G. Allied debts to the United States to be got into understandable form pending the general moratorium, and then refunded or revised or adjusted satisfactorily as between the nations concerned.

SECTION II.

A. The question of armaments might now be tackled. Europe could, should, and must demobilize most of her troops, and Italy and France must conform to the terms of the Washington naval agreements.

B. The great powers to agree on narrow limits for the number, tonnage, and armament of submarines and other naval auxiliaries and tackle other problems not settled at the Washington conference.

Then the world, solvent, with useful tools in hand instead of weapons, could set about earning its bread in the sweat of its brow and raise crops instead of hell.

KEEP OUR SONS OUT OF WAR.

We are unalterably opposed to American young men being sent across the seas again to fight in another foreign war.

We believe there is not a family in the United States, rich or poor, which does not wholeheartedly share this sentiment.

The duty of the Government at Washington, then, is clear. It is up to the officials to take the steps necessary to keep us out of such a war.

How can this be done? By preventing such a war—certainly not by continuing the policy of "isolation." We tried that from 1914 to 1917. We tried hard. And we failed.

A new war is brewing in Europe. If it comes, we will be dragged in again.

Americans are not servile cowards, and there is a point beyond which we will always cease to turn the other cheek.

Washington officials must choose between two courses. One, the easiest way, is to do nothing—let the war drift upon us; then try to keep out with every chance against our being able to do so.

The other, the harder way, the way which requires statesmanship, is to avert war, not wait until it comes.

Yesterday the News-Bee offered a plan to prevent another World War.

We suggested that President Harding call a conference of the chief World War powers and lay before them a definite, check-your-gun-at-the-door proposition for world sanity.

The plan involves no "meddling" in European politics; it suggests nothing to "entangle" us; there is nothing about it any more radical than President Harding has already undertaken in the four-power pact to keep the peace of the Pacific.

It merely means the United States, the greatest power on earth, and the one great disinterested power, would throw every ounce of its stupendous weight into the balance for peace and against war.

The American Government is in a position to lay before the world a peace program which no European cabinetiers or politicians would dare refuse to support. The peace-hungry peoples over there would chuck them out on their heads if they did.

World peace means work instead of war. It means life instead of death; food instead of hunger; it means markets for the American farmer's surplus crops and the American manufacturer's surplus products. It means less unemployment; more money; better times.

It means keeping our boys at home.

PEACE OR WAR?—THE STAKE IS YOUR BOY'S LIFE.

Now and then somebody rises to say international conferences don't get us anywhere.

Simon-pure mossbacks! With a simple "pooh-pooh" they wave aside the efforts of several previous administrations, both Republican and Democratic, to have world powers agree to arbitration rather than go to war over their disputes.

The "pooh-poohers" point to the conferences of Europe, an endless series of which having accomplished little.

England is suspicious of France. France is even more suspicious of England. Belgium doesn't know which, if either, to rely on. Italy eyes them all with distrust. Germany is awaiting the day when she can "come back." Russia, jealous and desperate, is ready to join any combination which promises recognition. And so on.

Not one nation of Europe trusts any other nation of Europe. And with reason.

On the other hand, these nations are asking the United States to help.

They know they can trust this country. We have nothing to gain but world peace, and they know it. So our word means something. That is why a conference with the United States taking a leading part would get somewhere.

But supposing it didn't. Suppose not a single agreement were reached by the great powers attending the conference. What would be the result?

This: 1. The world must at least credit the United States with having done everything it could to put civilization back on its feet. (Just now the world hates us because people are saying we can help them and won't.)

2. The world would know just which nation or group of nations is blocking peace, and why.

3. World opinion thus brought to bear on such a nation or group of nations would ultimately bring it to its senses.

In short, a conference would clarify the international atmosphere. Uncertainty, the greatest foe known either to business or to peace, would be swept away, whatever happened.

We would know where we are headed and could act accordingly.

There's everything to gain and nothing to lose by trying to avert the war now being cooked up in Europe.

If war comes, no power on earth can keep this country out. Make no mistake about that. The way to keep out of the next war is to prevent such a war. That is a job that Uncle Sam can do and that nobody else can.

"I am only stating quite frankly my view that unless America takes a hand * * * a real settlement will be postponed until the hour of irreparable mischief strikes." (David Lloyd-George, former Premier of Britain.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 15 minutes.

CODE OF LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, after 20 months of great patience in delay the House Committee on Revision of the Laws, which on May 16, 1921, passed through this House by unanimous vote House bill 12, a bill to establish a Code of the Laws of the United States, has for the first and only time received a suggestion of a mistake from the committee to which that bill was assigned some 20 months ago at the other end of the Capitol. That after the strongest pressure we could only secure a suggestion of one mistake is, of course, in effect a very great compliment to the bill, and as that is the only one specified, let us hope that the bill will be passed without further delay.

ONLY 1 SECTION OF 10,000 ALLEGED WRONG.

The claim is that the law with regard to foreign ministers and ambassadors in sections 3221 and 3214 is wrong. Section 3221 says that there shall be one minister resident accredited to Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua. We are told that there are now five and that our section is wrong. The Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, page 672, found in our section 3214, says that—

Hereafter no new ambassadorship shall be created unless the same shall be provided for by act of Congress.

It is claimed that that is not the law. As this is the only suggestion of error, we will take it right up. I urged upon the gentleman that if he would name 10 mistakes we would soon dispose of that number and it would be a better evidence of his good faith. My colleague, Mr. LONGWORTH, of Ohio, who was with me, will verify the fact that he only claimed to point out one mistake, to put his finger on one statement of the law that was wrong.

By the way, my colleague suggested that probably the committee was right, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], an eminent member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said to me this morning that our committee did the only thing it could do, putting it in.

As you know, the purpose of House bill 12 is to present the law as made by Congress, unless it has been repealed or decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The committee has no earthly excuse for just quietly omitting some law, and we have had some considerable opposition because we declined to allow interested people to induce us to omit the law.

The situation is this: The Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, page 672, says:

Hereafter no new ambassadorship shall be created unless the same shall be provided for by act of Congress.

This is the law of the United States as made by Congress. No court, so far as I can learn, has ever held that it is unconstitutional. Therefore, in the judgment of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, it is still in force and effect and it is inserted as section 3214 of House bill 12.

While the other people have not directed our attention to the Constitution of the United States and probably had not thought of it in this connection, the basis of their suggestion, which they evidently got from somebody else, is Article II, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the President shall appoint ambassadors and consuls, with the advice and consent of the Senate, but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

In the case of United States v. Eaton (109 U. S. 331-352) it was held that Congress may vest the appointment of a vice consul in the President if it wants to.

The act of March 1, 1893 (27 S. 497), authorizes the President to direct that the representatives of the United States to other governments shall have the same title that is given by the other governments to their diplomatic representatives to the United States, and this law was in force until March 2, 1909, when it was repealed by the specific statement of repeal in 35 S. 672, and Congress said what is embodied in section 3214 of House bill 12.

Nevertheless, the department and the President have acted on the theory evidently that it is unconstitutional, as many good lawyers have, and it is quite probable that the courts would so hold, but the Committee on Revision of the Laws does not feel that it is authorized to suggest to Congress that it repeal the law or hold it unconstitutional. We do not attempt to govern or even suggest the position that the President and the Secretary of State should take in enforcing the law or in not enforcing it, but we feel that it is our duty under our pledge to the House to repeat the law as Congress wrote it and make the same mistakes that Congress made, if any. [Applause.]

The President has appointed quite a number of ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary to various countries, which appointments are not authorized by any law except by Article II of the Constitution, if it governs. That article can be found by all comers in the Constitution of the United States, but it is not found anywhere in any laws enacted by Congress, and that is all the committee has reported.

There is in section 3221 of the proposed code a law providing that only one minister shall be sent to the five Central American Republics. The President has since provided a minister for each of them and Congress has made appropriations to pay them, but Congress has never amended the law embodied in section 3221 and in section 3222. This Committee on Revision is the servant of the House and therefore of the Congress, and until we are directed by Congress that there is an amendment of the law embodied in sections 3221 and 3222, it would seem to me that it is absolutely imperative that these laws shall be presented in any code that may be proffered in the House or in Congress.

The laws of the United States, as found in the Revised Statutes, 1682; 18 S. 484, and 40 S. 1326, embodied in section 3221 of House bill 12, state that—

There shall be but one minister resident accredited to Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua.

THE SECTION IS AS MADE BY CONGRESS EXACTLY.

There has been no repeal of this by Congress; there has been no declaration that it is unconstitutional by any court. However, the President has appointed five ministers to those five States, and Congress has appropriated for them. As this law has never been repealed and never declared unconstitutional, it is, of course, still in effect, but the appropriations by Congress are paying the five gentlemen who go to Central America.

Having found no repeal and having learned of no decision declaring it unconstitutional, the committee had no option but to place it here in H. R. 12. It will not be any more in effect if the bill becomes a law than it is right now, and the situation will continue just as it is with five ministers being paid down there. That is a difficulty in the law for which the committee is in no way responsible. The Congress should keep the laws in better shape and more understandable.

We undertake to repeat what you have done, not to correct it. If there is a flaw in it, it is yours, not ours. [Applause.]

As to the ambassadorships, Thirty-fifth Statutes, page 672, which is presented in section 3214, specifically provides that hereafter there shall be no more ambassadorships after that date except by authority of Congress. There is not any other law on the subject except what is in the Constitution, which is quite accessible, and which will not be interfered with by anything Congress does any time. As the law in the Thirty-fifth Statutes, page 672, has never been repealed and has never been declared unconstitutional, as far as I can learn it is still the law and should be right where it is in this proposed legislation.

On November 22, 1922, the chairman of the Revision of Laws Committee wrote the solicitor of the State Department that whenever this H. R. 12 may become a law, having thus assembled all the statutory enactments on the subject, an amendment to the present laws should be arranged for by the State Department which would bring the ambassadorial appointments down to date and embody them in a statute.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Kansas is making a very important statement and we should all be able to hear it. This legislation is of great importance.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. LITTLE. All it is is all of the laws of the United States. That is all.

THEY CAN AMEND IN FIVE MINUTES, IF AN ERROR IS LOCATED.

If they wish to make an amendment, it can be done in five minutes. Let them bring it back here then, and we will see what we will decide about it. We will have no trouble in acting promptly on it.

It is the judgment of the committee and of every lawyer in the House with whom I have consulted that the law as presented in House bill 12 with regard to the ambassadors and ministers is the law just as it was made and just as it stands. If the other committee has any arguments to produce, they will, of course, produce them, because we will take it for granted that their chairman is acting in good faith and should be prepared to justify his position. No lawyer would ever announce that a statute was unconstitutional and expect us to believe him without argument, and of course no gentleman would endeavor to toss all this work by the House and its committee and its double vote of confidence in the bill into a wastebasket under some unsupported criticism of his, and we shall expect to hear the reasons why he thinks sections 3214 and 3221 should be eliminated or his frank confession that we are right.

WHY DELAY 20 MONTHS?

Furthermore, we must frankly say that nobody that has any respect for himself will stand on one objection like that if he really proposes to veto a bill of this extent and labor. We shall expect soon another statement of what specific section is wrong in this bill, and if we do not get it that will be equivalent to a confession that no other alleged mistakes have been found in any other sections.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe that is the real reason why this bill has not been reported and passed by the Senate?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman excuse me from answering that at present?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly, I will; but I thought the gentleman ought to take the House into his confidence.

Mr. LITTLE. I will presently, if it is necessary.

Mr. GARNER. The matter has been threshed out pro and con, criticisms have been made, inferences have been drawn, but there has nothing been said about any book concern holding up this bill. I want the gentleman to tell the truth about it as far as he knows it.

Mr. LITTLE. They have presented just one objection, and I have disposed of it here to-day. I now await their next one. If they have but one, I will ask them to approve or give their reasons. As to any other objections, if they state them, I will take them up as soon as they are pointed out.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. Anyone who asks the gentleman's committee to eliminate this controverted section is really asking the gentleman's committee to take the place of the Supreme Court of the United States, is he not?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; and asking us to violate our oaths. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. I should like to emphasize what the gentleman said in this debate. The other day the Committee on Appropriations had put in a provision creating an ambassador. At that time the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] called attention to the statute which said that the President was prohibited by Congress from creating an ambassador by the act of 1909. The gentleman from Indiana said that that had been declared unconstitutional. Now, the fact is brought out here that it has not been declared unconstitutional.

Mr. LITTLE. It never was.

Mr. FISH. That is the great objection to that kind of legislation. It is not referred to the proper committee, and it is passed hastily through the House without the careful consideration which this codification has received.

Mr. LITTLE. They decline to give consideration to a bill which has the unanimous indorsement of the House, 150 Members of which inspected the work with care when it was being done in the committee rooms and were its enthusiastic supporters. Is that chairman so much greater lawyer than the committee, the revisers, and the House?

This House has twice unanimously indorsed this bill and approved it. There have been two years of delay before we got a committee meeting at the other end of the Capitol, but practically no investigation, and only one mistake pointed out. To be honest about it, it has never had two hours' real consideration there, but he waves his hands and says, "Off with its head! So much for Buckingham!" [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me this bill is one of the great constructive measures this Congress has had a chance to pass. The House committee has done its full duty in presenting this bill after exhaustive research and labor. The House has done its full duty in passing the bill more than 20 months ago. The Senate committee has utterly failed to act or to do anything. There is no justification or excuse for their nonaction and every court in the land is anxious for such legislation. But the public does not and can not know of its importance, and so it sleeps. As to sections 3214 and 3221 it is obvious that they are existing law and the gentleman from Kansas rightly left them in this bill.

Mr. LITTLE. They met a few days ago for the first time in 20 months. The chairman said he did not like the bill, and he thought just as much of the bill as I did of his judgment. [Applause.]

Herewith I add the letter from Secretary Hughes as extension:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 27, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 23, 1923, in which you state that in a communication dated November 22, 1922, to which no written reply has been received, you advised the department of the attitude of the House Committee on Revision of the Laws regarding certain suggestions which the department had made concerning sections 3214, 3221, and 3222 of bill H. R. 12, and that you understood that the department concurred in the view of the committee. You add that Senator ERNST, chairman of the Senate Committee on Revision of the Laws, has informed you of the receipt from the department of a communication criticizing sections 3221 and 3222 of the bill, and inclose a statement of the law as understood by your committee, concerning which you desire the department's comments.

I beg to inform you that in response to a communication dated November 10, 1922, from Senator ERNST, requesting that the department give to the Senate Committee on Revision of the Laws the benefit of any suggestions it might desire to make concerning bill H. R. 12, the department on December 7, 1922, stated that at the time bill H. R. 9389 was receiving the consideration of the House committee a memorandum had been prepared in response to a request from you containing brief comments on certain sections of the bill. A copy of the memorandum was transmitted to Senator ERNST for the information of the Senate committee and he was advised that the department at that time had no additional suggestions to offer concerning the sections covered by that memorandum.

It is observed that the title of H. R. 12 is "A bill to consolidate, codify, revise, and reenact the general and permanent laws of the United States in force March 4, 1919." At the time the department's memorandum was prepared it was assumed that it was within the scope of the work of your committee in revising the laws of the United States to make all the changes suggested in the memorandum. In any event it was thought desirable to give your committee the benefit of such suggestions as occurred to the department with respect to the sections covered by the memorandum. The question, however, whether the scope of the work of the committee in revising the laws of the United States would permit the adoption of the suggestions which the department made concerning sections 3221 and 3222 of the bill (none was made respecting section 3214) is obviously a matter for determination by the committee, concerning which I would not feel free to express an opinion.

I have noted your statement that after the bill becomes a law you intend to suggest to the department that an amendment be prepared for the purpose of correcting such inaccuracies as may appear.

I am, my dear Mr. LITTLE,
Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

And I present the answer to the Secretary's letter from the chairman:

JANUARY 28, 1923.

HON. CHARLES E. HUGHES,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Replying to your favor of the 27th answering my letter of the 23d, I note that on December 7, 1922, the department in response to a communication from Senator ERNST dated November 10, 1922, sent him "a copy of a memorandum" and stated that "at the time H. R. 9389 was receiving consideration in the House, a memorandum had been prepared in response to a request from the chairman of the House Committee on Revision, containing brief comments on certain sections of that bill" and "that the department had no additional suggestions to offer concerning the sections covered by that memorandum."

I write to inquire whether you will kindly send me a copy of the memorandum that you forwarded him December 7, with the date thereof. H. R. 9389 passed the House December 20, 1920, and the memoranda with regard to that were long since utilized.

I note your remark that you say, "I have noted your statement that after the bill becomes a law you intend to suggest to the department that an amendment be prepared for the purpose of correcting such inaccuracies as may appear." I presume you refer to my letter of April 11, 1922, in which I said, "Our plan is simply to prepare a bill that contains the present law without any change whatever. This bill is now the law, and if it passes the Senate it becomes a law, and we will then have something to begin with, doing away with the past confusion. Our committee will then bring in a bill suggesting some changes correcting what appear to be errors in the present law." I was not referring to inaccuracies in our bill, but the errors in the present law, such, perhaps, as may exist with regard to these ministers and ambassadors, but which are errors by Congress—not in this bill.

Before the old Revised Statutes were fully printed a bill was passed correcting 34 mistakes in it, and two years later a bill was enacted which corrected 242 imperfections in the old Revised Statutes. In my bill to establish a code I have supplied 60 omissions in the Revised Statutes which still remain. If we adhere to the precedent set by the Revised Statutes people we will, as you suggest, introduce a bill to correct our mistakes, if any there be. I suppose we ought to adhere to that precedent, should we not? Our book is three times as large as was theirs, and if we adhered to their percentage of mistakes we would have over a thousand to correct, and with all the nervous assistance of young gentlemen admitted to the bar here and there, and people who want us to omit the law to make easy their social duties, we have been only able to locate 66 instead of over a thousand. I am glad you feel that what the committee did was just what it should have done.

Very sincerely yours,

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. May I ask unanimous consent for two minutes to make some observations on the same subject?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

COAL SHORTAGE.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, on January 11 I called to the attention of the House the fact that in spite of the extreme shortage of coal, and especially of anthracite, in the United States this winter we had been shipping to Canada largely increased quantities both of anthracite and bituminous coal. I pointed out that October, 1922, exports to Canada showed a 33 per cent increase over the exports of October, 1921, and that November, 1922, showed a similar increase. I also gave official figures to prove that total exports to Canada of bituminous coal had recently been greatly larger than in 1921, although the latter year was the largest coal-export year in the history of the United States.

I had hoped—and, frankly, I had believed—that the December figures, when announced by the Department of Commerce, would tell a very different story. The extremity of our consumers, the fact that we are now in midwinter, and the notorious extortion which is being practiced upon purchasers all over the country—all these things seemed to me to combine in an insistent demand that the sending out of anthracite coal to Canada should be greatly curtailed, if not completely stopped.

In this connection I noted the statement of our Fuel Distributor, Mr. Spens, just before he left office, in which he said, referring to the necessity of using substitutes for anthracite in this country, "We have no information that similar drastic steps have been adopted in Canada."

I had in mind the statement reported in press dispatches from Ottawa that Dr. Charles Camsell, Deputy Minister of Mines and member of the Federal Fuel Board of Canada, recently stated that in the course of a visit which he had made to Washington "he had been assured that Canada would be treated as though it were a State of the Union in the matter of fuel supplies." In a time of our own extreme stress I ask, parenthetically, Should Canada be treated like a forty-ninth State?

I had in mind that in certain portions of Canada at least it is authoritatively stated that there is more American anthracite in proportion than there is in almost any section of the United States, and that advertising has been utilized as a medium of effecting sales, and I had in mind the fact that all the evidence seems to point to a sale price of American coal in Canada very much less—from $2 to $7 a ton less—than at most points in the United States.

I had in mind a telegram which I have just received from my own city that Lowell "is destitute of hard coal." I had in mind the statement made by the president of the Lynn Chamber of Commerce—although Lynn is a city on tidewater—to the following effect:

In the small amount of anthracite coal that comes into Lynn only about 65 per cent of it is combustible fuel. The poor and humbler citizens of the community are paying anywhere from $18 to $22 a ton for coal that is so miserable in quality that it should never have been shipped from the mines in any event.

I had in mind a recent letter from Detroit, typical of many, which contains the following sentences:

I have personally visited many families of the tenement districts of Detroit and the condition is appalling. I met a family consisting of father, mother, and five children burning wood and obtaining poor heat out of that. The mother is expected to be confined shortly, and one of the children is sick in bed.

As I recalled these things they seemed to me to present a case for drastic and instant action. I could not believe that our coal-regulating authorities would have allowed the conditions of October and November to persist through December.

But the official figures just released by the Department of Commerce tell their own story. For December, 1921, we exported to Canada 800,000 tons of anthracite coal; 1921, as I have said, was the greatest coal export year in our history. Yet in December, 1922, we exported 375,000 tons, an increase of about 25 per cent. Did we skimp Canada on bituminous? In December, 1921, we exported 621,000 tons of bituminous to Canada. Last month we exported 1,376,000 tons, very much more than twice as much as a year ago. Evidently all this talk of a coal shortage in the United States is, in the minds of some of our officials, a figment of the imagination. Is there, after all, plenty of coal in the United States, if we can so largely increase our exports in midwinter?

Take the combined figures for the three months, October, November, December, 1921 and 1922. For the three months a year ago the anthracite export figure was 923,000 tons. For the three months just ended it was 1,209,000 tons, 30 per cent more than a year ago.

The bituminous figures are, respectively, 2,637,000 for 1921 and 4,586,000 for 1922, an increase of about 75 per cent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman tell us whether those who may have official responsibility in this business give any satisfactory reason for the diversion of the coal to Canada?

Mr. ROGERS. I will refer the gentleman to the speech which I made in the House on January 11, in which I went into that question with a good deal of particularity. The only reason I have heard advanced by any responsible person, and I have talked with a good many, was that we must be neighborly. When Canada can purchase freely American anthracite for $2 to $7 a ton less than we must pay in America when we can get it at any price, I think neighborliness may be said to be carried to an extreme.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In view of the revelations I did not know but that they might have changed the form of their answers.

Mr. ROGERS. I thought that December would certainly show a change in the figures as well as in the answers.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I have just received a communication from St. Lawrence County, in my State, inclosing a clipping from the largest daily in Montreal, in which it says that they could furnish all the coal that was wanted if the people would pay the price, and he wanted to know why if the people of Montreal could get it the people in St. Lawrence County could not get it. Can the gentleman give us any information?

Mr. ROGERS. I have a telegram from my own city, Lowell, which says that it is destitute of hard coal. I have a statement from the Chamber of Commerce of Lynn, Mass., a city on tidewater, which says that when they can get coal at all they have to pay from $18 to $22 a ton for it. These are typical of conditions everywhere in the United States. Yet the control price of American anthracite in Canada is $15.50 to $16.50 per ton.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the American coal miner is willing to sell his coal at a less price to people in Canada than he does in the United States?

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that. I will say what is the fact, that the Canadian consumers of American anthracite pay less than the average consumer in the United States.

Mr. GARNER. That would indicate that the miners are selling it over there for a less price than they are selling it here.

Mr. ROGERS. I think in a large measure the spread is due to the imperfect control of profiteering here. I have in my files an explicit statement from the Federal fuel administrator that profiteering is going on in the coal industry. After all this is simply a statement of what we all know to be the fact.

To me the situation is so incredible and so preposterous that I scarcely know how to make comment upon it. The American people—I say to the House again what I said two weeks ago—will not be indefinitely patient as they see themselves denuded of the coal which is essential to their comfort and prosperity—even to their very lives.

Pick up almost at random any newspaper in the northern and eastern sections of the United States and you will find that this subject is what I hope I shall be pardoned for calling a burning issue. The Boston Post of Wednesday, for example, has two articles upon coal. One is in the form of a dispatch from Augusta, Me., which states that Andrew P. Lane, State fuel director for Maine, declared to the legislative committee that coal dealers in Portland were exacting as high as $30 a ton for coal. Since last Thursday, Mr. Lane said, he had visited 285 families in the city of Portland who had been unable to secure coal. The same issue of the Boston Post reports that less coal came into Boston last week than in any week in over a month. Yesterday's Boston Herald has the following dispatch from the statehouse:

At the close of its first public hearing yesterday the house rules committee voted to admit an order filed by Representative James J. Mellon, of Charlestown, which would put the house on record in favor of the bill of Congressman JOHN JACOB ROGERS for the embargo on exportation of anthracite.

I again assure Members of the House that the people of the country are more concerned with this question than with any other domestic matter. The Congress of the United States will be held to a strict accounting. We go out of existence March 4 and in ordinary course the new Congress will not convene until December. We must deal with this coal matter now or it will be too late. I believe that the American people demand action and, what is more to the point, that they have an absolute right and duty to summon us to action.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Has the gentleman the figures for 1921 when it is said that more coal was sent to Canada than in any other year? Why does not the gentleman give the figures for the whole year?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

[Mr. ROGERS had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. ROGERS. As illustrative of the extremities to which our people are now being reduced, I desire to quote a brief article which was published in the Lowell Courier-Citizen day before yesterday:

A doctor's prescription calling for coal was made out several days ago by a local doctor, and through the efforts of Charles F. Richardson, of the Humane Society, the sick person to whom the prescription was made out is now more comfortable, although the supply of coal that was received was not alarmingly large.

This prescription is the first that has come into the hands of the Lowell Humane Society, but throughout the winter Mr. Richardson has had many pathetic pleas from almost destitute people who have been without fuel of any sort for many days. In some cases the stories of suffering have been almost unbelievable, and in each case the society has done its best to relieve the suffering.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a Representative in this House should be closer to the people than a representative at the other end of the Capitol. We have to go back to the people every two years to be passed upon and get a new commission in order to come back. Our distinguished brethren in the other end of the Capitol only have to go back for approval every six years. For that reason we are held responsible to the people and by the people more than are our brethren at the other end of the Capitol. It should make us a little more careful than they on expenditures of the public funds.

When this bill first came before the House for consideration and passage the Bureau of the Budget had estimated for this department a maximum of $69,031,613. But the committee, presided over by our distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], had pared down the estimates, had pared down the proposed expenditures, and brought the bill in below the estimate by exercise of proper economies. But the House in passing the bill inserted numerous amendments, so that when it left this body the House by amendment had increased the Budget estimate by $36,440.

Now what happened in the Senate? They have passed it with additional increases of $4,673,600. That is the way the bill comes back to us. What are some of these increases? Let me call attention to amendment No. 31 passed by the Senate. Under the present law of this land the scientific employees in the Agriculture Department have a basic salary fixed by law at $4,500. But the Senate is not content with providing an increase in this appropriation of $2,000 each for 15 employees for this year, but they make a permanent law by amendment No. 31, authorizing an increase of as much as $2,000 each thereafter to at least as many as 2,500 and possibly to as many as 8,700 scientific employees.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In one minute. They say:

Hereafter the maximum salary of any scientific investigator, or other employee engaged in scientific work and paid from the general appropriation of the Department of Agriculture, shall not exceed at the rate of $6,500 per annum: Provided, That for the fiscal year 1924 no salary shall be paid under this paragraph at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000 except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In one minute. The "hereafter" they put in this amendment makes it permanent law, and after 1924 the $2,000 raise may be given to at least 2,500 employees. My colleague knows that that makes it permanent law for all time until Congress shall change it. It may be that some of them ought to have their salary raised, but it should be by a proper legislative committee of the House, which should pass upon it and determine it.

Let me show you how some of these scientific experts earn their salaries. I am informed by reliable pecan experts in Texas that the State of Texas now produces about 90 per cent of all of the commercial pecans raised in the whole United States. There had been established four years ago in the State of Texas what was known as a pecan laboratory. Through the work and influence of that laboratory thousands of good citizens were induced to plant trees, to bud and graft the native pecan trees along the many streams of Texas. They have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars. Then one of the experts in charge of that laboratory, who happens to be a native of Georgia, with his interests mostly in Georgia, without any hearing at all issued an order to box up that pecan laboratory and move it to Georgia, move it from a State that now produces the great bulk of the commercial pecans of this country. He had the pecan laboratory boxed up and at the railroad depot and ready to go into the cars when the people found out about it and raised a protest.

That expert caused the pecan raisers of my State to go to the expense of sending their representatives across the State to attend hearings in respect to the matter, and they did so before they could induce the expert to keep the laboratory there. After the hearing he kept it there, and now we have raised his salary $2,000. Georgia is raising some very fine pecans, and if it needs a laboratory, Congress will give it one, but the one in Texas should not have been disturbed. I am not against a proper raise of salaries, where they may be passed upon properly, but a legislative committee ought to do that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I have only 10 minutes and I think the gentleman is going to get 15 minutes directly. I am with him on his proposition. I want to show you how easy it is to put things in appropriation bills. The Senate, for the schools of Washington, added an increase of over $1,000,000 above the House estimates. No legislative committee, nor any subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, considered that, but it was put on there on the recommendation of Superintendent Ballou. Let me show you another recommendation of Superintendent Ballou. Recently he issued an order that no teacher of the 2,500 in Washington shall teach more than five hours a day, four days in the week. He is establishing a 20-hour teaching week for the teachers, which will require one-fifth more teachers in the District of Columbia to be paid for by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, 60 per cent, and by the general taxpayers of the United States, 40 per cent. Why should a teacher teach only five hours a day for only four days a week? Why should not a teacher teach five days a week? Why should a teacher teach only 20 hours a week? I am one of those who believe that every man, Congressman and everyone else, should give a good day's work and a good week's work.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I want first to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky. Then I will gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman said that a proper legislative committee ought to regulate these salaries. Last year the Committee on Agriculture spent days in hearings on this matter and reported a bill which has been on the calendar for a year. Yet there has been no request from the Agricultural Department for consideration of that bill, but they come in here now and endeavor to make this permanent law.

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what I have been trying to emphasize in my argument, that it is the duty of our legislative committees to make these substantial changes in our laws that are almost impossible to change thereafter in the annual supply bills.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not think such speeches as these ought to be made to empty benches. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment until I move the previous question on the conference report?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 11: Page 36, after the word "forests," in line 17, insert "and the Secretary of Agriculture may hereafter, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the national forests to be exported from the State or Territory in which said forests are respectively situated."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the national forests to be exported from the State or Territory in which said forests are respectively situated."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment simply restores the language which has been carried in the House for many years with respect to this item and strikes out of the Senate amendment the word "hereafter," so that it becomes an annual instead of a permanent law.

Mr. DOWELL. What is meant by the word "exported"?

Mr. ANDERSON. That refers to exportation out of the State and also exportation out of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me two minutes in which to make a brief statement?

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall be glad to upon the next item.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 31, page 81, after line 17, insert:

"MAXIMUM SALARIES.

"Hereafter the maximum salary of any scientific investigator, or other employee engaged in scientific work and paid from the general appropriation of the Department of Agriculture, shall not exceed at the rate of $6,500 per annum: Provided, That for the fiscal year 1924 no salary shall be paid under this paragraph at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000 except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each."

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter is important enough to be considered by more people than are here now, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House, probably I can hold it for a minute anyway; but I want to make a suggestion, if I may, to the Committee on Appropriations, to the House of Representatives, and the subcommittee acting for the Committee on Appropriations. I believe I stated once before, or a number of times, I was one of those who believed in creating a large committee and voted for the rule creating it, and I believed it would be beneficial to the country by reducing the appropriation from $100,000,000 to $3,000,000. I have not changed my views entirely about that yet. At the time this committee was created, as I understand it, it was with the distinct understanding that it would not report any legislation upon an appropriation bill. Now, if it was not the understanding, I want some gentleman to rise in his place and correct me. The history of the Committee on Appropriations does not bear out that assumption. Now we hear the Committee on Appropriations, through its chairman, Mr. MADDEN, and through the ranking Member on the Democratic side, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, say to the House of Representatives, "We will not report any legislation." But, if I understand it, in the Army bill, while the subcommittee recommended 15 amendments which carried legislation, the entire committee struck them all out; and I commend the entire committee for its wisdom. But here is what happened, and what happened in this instance. You go over to the Senate, and they put on some amendments. You meet in conference, and the conferees disagree to those amendments; and the subcommittee comes back to the House of Representatives and moves to concur in those amendments. So the result is that what you have refused in the House is accomplished through the Senate.

I want now to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], that if you mean what you say, if you do not intend to infringe upon the other committees by reporting legislation, when you go back to the Senate and get around the conference table, the first thing I would say to the Senators would be that "not one line of legislation would go in this bill with our permission. Whenever you get ready to recede from your legislation we are ready to go into conference and consider the other items, but as long as you insist upon your legislation we are going back to the House of Representatives and ask them to confirm us in our stand against the legislation." And I venture the suggestion that if you will do that the House of Representatives will back you up and the Senate will take off this legislation. [Applause.] But you have got to have a little courage yourself. I will tell you the reason they do not do it, and I am not impugning the motives of any man, but some of the conferees want some legislation themselves, and they are willing to agree to it, and the result is they do not want to change this policy. I say they are making a mistake. They are going to come back to the proposition of nine appropriating committees and have nobody to blame for it but themselves, because you are not carrying out the spirit of this House when it was enacted into a large committee. You have the power to do it, and I venture the assertion that this House would rise by 90 per cent and declare that to be the policy, that if you will not agree to any legislation on an appropriation bill put on by the Senate, we will back you up. But if you come back and undertake to discriminate yourself then we propose to discriminate ourselves. We have the right as well as you and—

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. TILSON. I agree with the position of the gentleman, but is the gentleman sure that the House would do what he says with such unanimity as he predicts? Is it not a fact in the case of the Army bill that the subcommittee kept the legislation off of the bill, but we ourselves put on a considerable number of amendments carrying legislation?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairmen of the subcommittees will get up on the floor of the House and say, "Gentleman, it is the policy of your committee; are you willing to stand back of it?" do not you believe they will do it?

Mr. TILSON. We did not do it in the case referred to.

Mr. GARNER. I will ask the gentleman, as a general policy would not he do it?

Mr. TILSON. We ought to do it.

Mr. GARNER. Then I presume that the gentleman will do what he ought to do in supporting the policy of the committee.

Mr. TILSON. I have supported the position of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. But the trouble about it is this—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Take some more time.

Mr. GARNER. I do not care for more time. I merely desired to call attention to this.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I agree in the main with the views expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I think we should live up to the letter and the spirit of the policy we announced in creating a single appropriating committee. I think the committee should avoid, so far as it is humanly possible, reporting legislative provisions. I think the Senate should refrain, so far as it is possible under existing conditions, from attempting to place legislative items on an appropriation bill; but we can scarcely expect that the new order shall work perfectly immediately, or so soon after its adoption.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment; let me make my statement and then I will yield. I think that the legislative committees are themselves just a little to blame for the situation in which we find ourselves.

The Committee on Appropriations should not attempt to legislate or report legislation, but the legislative committees should legislate and should report legislation; and they should insist upon the consideration of their important legislation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question at that point?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman recalls, does he not, that upon this particular matter of a reclassification of salaries the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service did report a reclassification bill, and the House passed it, covering not only all the positions in this branch of the service but all the positions in all the other branches of the service?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. More than that, my understanding is—and the chairman of the subcommittee will correct me if I am not correct in my statement, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ANDERSON]—my recollection is that a bill was reported some time ago carrying practically the provisions that are contained in this item.

Mr. ANDERSON. A bill on the subject was reported which is similar to the provision carried in this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. And it was reported something over a year ago?

Mr. ANDERSON. It was reported, I think, about March 12, 1922.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that statement should go into the Record without explanation.

Mr. MONDELL. There was a bill reported on this subject.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood the gentleman to state that the legislative committee was to blame.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; the gentleman has not said that the legislative committees were to blame.

Mr. HAUGEN. I prefer to have the matter cleared up now.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a fact, is it not, that the Committee on Agriculture did report a bill on this subject more than a year ago?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is altogether a different bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a bill embracing the same subject, and it is a bill that would have enabled the House, if considered, to pass upon the matter just as we are now proposing to pass upon it.

Now I have not said and I shall not say that the Committee on Agriculture has been derelict in its duty in not calling that bill up. We have been crowded for time, and while the committee has occupied the time of the House on various occasions since that bill was reported, it has had other important legislation which has been considered. I am not complaining of the Committee on Agriculture, and yet I think it is true that if the committee had considered that measure of primary importance we could have arranged for its consideration.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield just for information?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. But the matter not having been considered, a condition has arisen in the Department of Agriculture under which the Secretary of that department says it is absolutely essential that he shall have some relief.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I just want to ask a question for information. Could not this trouble have been cured by making legislation on an appropriation bill subject to a point of order at any time, just as an appropriation on a legislative bill is subject to a point of order at any time?

Mr. MONDELL. A lot of things could be done in the way of a modification of the rules. I think the rules are all right as they are touching these matters.

Mr. JONES of Texas. At the present time if an appropriation item is put on a legislative bill a point of order can be made at any time. Consequently, since the establishment of this rule there has never been an appropriation placed on a legislative bill. Now, if you would turn around and say that no legislation shall be carried on an appropriation bill, that would remedy the situation.

Mr. MONDELL. We have exactly that rule now. Legislation can not be placed on an appropriation bill unless it comes under the Holman rule without being subject to a point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But we require that a point of order must be made before the legislation is passed in the House, at the time it comes up in the House; and if the Senate puts on a legislative provision you can not knock it out; whereas you can knock out an appropriation on a legislative bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. For a brief question.

Mr. GARNER. If a matter is of sufficient importance or emergency that legislation ought to go on an appropriation bill, do not you think that the rules of the committee ought to provide for that legislation and give the House a chance to consider it, rather than have the Committee on Appropriations take the responsibility?

Mr. MONDELL. It is not so easy a matter. In the first place, there is the question as to what constitutes legislation. A committee can not know in advance what the ruling will be under certain circumstances. There is no question about an appropriation. An appropriation is an appropriation, and there is no question of ruling in regard to it. We simply say that an appropriation shall not be made by a legislative committee. That is a comparatively simple matter.

But just one word more; it is a matter I have had in mind for some time. I do think that all the legislative committees—and I say this without intent to criticize—should very carefully consider their responsibilities under the changed conditions under which they do their work and have been doing their work since we have consolidated appropriations.

I think there has been rather too much of a disposition to take the position that, having lost the right to appropriate, there is nothing worth while left for the legislative committees to do. I think there is a wide and fruitful and useful field of work and effort for those committees. I think there are two things they should do. First, those committees that have not taken that action should report the legislation necessary to make in order those items that are the ordinary and necessary items on an appropriation bill. One of our difficulties lies in the fact that, as to some of the departments, we can not carry on an appropriation bill some of the essential items necessary to the carrying on of the regular work of the department because the legislative committees have failed to make those items in order. Without criticizing other committees, may I refer to the action taken by the Committee on Indian Affairs? That committee brought in a bill carefully prepared, which was carefully considered by the House, that clearly defined the authority of the Appropriations Committee, and in so doing clearly defined the authority of that committee in legislation. Following that this committee each session has taken up for consideration the legislation presented to it, the legislation suggested during the examinations before the Committee on Appropriations, and reports out an omnibus bill. In due time that bill is considered. I commend that practice to all of the legislative committees.

I think it would be very well, indeed, if following the consideration of the appropriation bills by the Committee on Appropriations the legislative committees would take up for consideration the legislative matters that have been presented to the Appropriations Committee and which that committee properly declined to consider. There were, as I understand it, 16 items—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming two minutes more, and will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and after that I shall yield only to gentlemen who want to talk about this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the extension of five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in this matter. I have been for the new rule, but I can see the harmful influence on the committees that have been deprived of much of their power. I wish to ask the floor leader if he has noticed any distinct result so far as this reform is concerned.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, I have not time in five minutes to discuss this matter in detail. I hope a little later to go into the question of the effect of the new method of appropriating. I have scarcely the time to answer that question in detail now. May I follow the line of my suggestion? There are several of the legislative committees that may very properly take up for consideration the propositions of legislation that have been presented to the Committee on Appropriations during its consideration of appropriation bills. Those legislative committees might well go further. They might very properly at some proper time enter upon the work which at one time it was contemplated the expenditures committees would perform, that of examining the expenditures of the departments.

During each examination there would come from the departments, and otherwise, suggestions and requests for legislation, and out of the suggestions that came from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, out of the proposals presented during examinations and from time to time by members of the committee, there could very properly be made up an omnibus legislative bill covering the activities of government over which each committee has jurisdiction. I think it would be quite proper to amend the rules so as to make in order the consideration by the House of at least one such piece of legislation from each of the legislative committees during a session of Congress. I think that in order to balance the matter of privilege and leave the legislative committees in as favorable a situation as they were before they were deprived of authority to appropriate, they should under the rules have the right to bring in at the proper time at least one omnibus legislative bill each session and have it privileged.

Mr. DOWELL. May I suggest to the gentleman that if he desires to stop legislation on appropriation bills, if he will amend the rules so as to prevent any legislation on appropriation bills it will force the legislative committees to act promptly.

Mr. MONDELL. We discussed that some time ago. The rules now prohibit legislation on our appropriation bill; but this is the thought I desire to emphasize, that the legislative committees of the House should, in good faith and with earnestness, apply themselves to their duties and responsibilities under the new conditions, and should present to the House at the proper time carefully considered legislative propositions, preferably in a single bill rather than divided up into numerous popgun measures, only one or two of which may, perhaps, be considered. And let me say again, I think it would be well to give such omnibus measures a privileged status in the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that nearly all the legislative committees of the House do report out legislation and have legislation on the calendar, but that they can not get it up because Calendar Wednesday is usually dispensed with?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we have dispensed with Calendar Wednesday in order to get rid of the appropriations program, practically by unanimous consent. We have now taken up Calendar Wednesday again. We will also have special rules. We will consider during this session much legislation coming from the legislative committees; but the legislation coming from those committees is divided into a multitude of small measures. If they could to a considerable extent be put together in one general legislative bill and given a privileged status, this whole matter of legislative authority being outrun by the needs of the public business would be largely cured, in my opinion.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk for a moment on the rule and also on the amendment. I am in entire accord with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has said concerning the impropriety of carrying legislation upon appropriation bills. It is true, as I remember it, that when the present rule was adopted, there were statements made and assurances given that thereafter there would not be legislation upon appropriation bills unless it was authorized under the rules of the House, and that the legislative committees would report such legislation as should be adopted. I feel satisfied that all the members of the Appropriations Committee realize the force of that pledge or promise, whatever you care to call it, and that they seek to keep legislation out of appropriation bills. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], when it develops, as it develops frequently in the consideration of these appropriation bills, that certain legislation is important and would be very helpful economically and otherwise, has, without incorporating those provisions in the appropriation bills, reported them to the chairman of the proper legislative committee, with the suggestion that he take them up with his committee and that his committee take such action as it deems wise.

But the trouble, gentlemen, is that the rules of the House and the rules of the Senate differ. My own idea is that it would be entirely proper and very helpful if the concurrence of the Senate could be obtained for a joint committee to be appointed to take up the question of the rules governing the making of appropriations, so as to have some uniformity between the two Houses. The Senate acts under different rules, and the result is that when the House conferees go to the Senate and are confronted with matters of legislation upon an appropriation bill and call the attention to the Senate conferees to the rule of the House which prohibits the legislation, we are confronted with the fact that under the rules of the Senate it is entirely in order, but the Senators insist upon their amendment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has said that there is a great deal of legislation upon appropriation bills. I lay down this proposition, that if you will investigate the record of appropriation bills since this new rule went into effect you will find far less legislation carried upon those appropriation bills than was enacted prior to the adoption of that rule. There can not be any question about that, and any gentleman who will take the time to investigate the appropriation bills passed prior to the adoption of that rule will find that that is a fact. I think that something ought to be done so as to bring about uniformity between the rules of the House and the rules of the Senate, because as long as nonuniformity exists we are going to be confronted by these propositions. It should be said that under the new rule adopted that the House now has full opportunity to pass upon the legislation, whereas under the old rule the House never had an opportunity to pass on the legislation carried in an appropriation bill, because the conferees would meet and agree on the legislation, report it back in the body of the report, and no Member had an opportunity to attack that piece of legislation, because in order to defeat it the House must vote down the whole report.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In just a moment. I do not know whether all these salaries are justified or not. They appear to me to be very large. I want to see the experts paid a reasonable salary, so that we can have the best experts obtainable.

I do not know whether all the salaries should be paid. They are much larger than they are in some other departments. When the amendment was put on the last appropriation bill it went on for that year alone, but now we are confronted with the fact that we are asked to vote for an amendment which makes it permanent law. I think the House should vote down the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate and concur in the amendment with an amendment to apply to this fiscal year alone, and meanwhile let the Agricultural Committee report a bill and let the House take action upon that.

I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming that the trouble is that many of the legislative committees do not always consider legislation which should be reported and enacted, and in saying this I am offering no criticism, but calling attention to what we all know to be a fact.

The trouble is that many matters are called to the attention of the committees which are not taken up on the floor of the House. The Appropriations Committee is confronted with them; we are confronted with the absence of legislation for things necessary and imperative, and yet when we put them on appropriation bills we are met with criticism on the floor of the House that we are not following the rules of the House. I hope the legislative committees will take these matters up and report some of this legislation so that the House can pass upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to address my remarks to members of legislative committees. I want to say to you that the principle involved in Senate amendment No. 31 vitally affects every legislative committee in this House. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming seems to leave the impression by innuendo, if not directly, that the Agricultural Committee has not done its duty. Under the system of this Republican House pertaining to legislative committees, before any of them can get consideration of any of the bills the chairman has to go, figuratively speaking, on his hands and knees to the Republican steering committee of the House, of which the gentleman from Wyoming is a prominent member, and get their consent before it can be considered.

Now, what is Senate amendment No. 31 that is proposed here? It proposes to make permanent law giving the Secretary of Agriculture the absolute power in his discretion to increase the salaries of every scientific employee in the Agricultural Department to $6,500 a year if he wants to, with the exception of the year 1924. How many employees are there doing scientific work in the Department of Agriculture? Let me show you what the hearings say. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] says:

Can you give a general idea about how many scientific men you have at the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BALL of the Agriculture Department, says approximately 2,500 technical scientists; about 3,700 scientific men.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the latter include the first group?

Doctor BALL. Yes. But when you get down to men that are doing technical research work, there are about 2,500. That is more than there are in all the other Government bureaus put together.

Therefore if this amendment is adopted as it is written, which will make it permanent law, you put into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture the power to increase the pay, if he wants to, to $6,500 of 2,500 men after the year 1924.

They talk about the diligence of the Agricultural Committee. Why, we conducted days' hearings last year on this matter, with the Secretary of Agriculture before us and all of his experts, and we carefully considered and reported the bill H. R. 10819 on the 9th day of March, 1922, to fix salaries of scientific men in this department. When the item came up in the Agricultural appropriation bill last year it went out on a point of order in the House. Then it was inserted in the Senate, and the members of the subcommittee of agriculture of the House said it ought to stay in the bill because the Committee on Agriculture had recently reported the bill but had not had time to consider it. This bill, H. R. 10819, has been on the calendar since March, 1922, and there has never been one request to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture from the Secretary of Agriculture to consider this legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman think that if the Committee on Agriculture reported the bill the Secretary of Agriculture should stand behind it with—

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; but I am opposed to the Secretary of Agriculture running to the Senate and asking for these increases, the same as last year, and the Senate giving him a bigger sum than he asks for, as I will show in a minute.

The only time the great steering committee gave the Committee on Agriculture any days for legislation was inspired by reason of the request for a rule, not for the consideration of public business like this, but for the consideration of private bills, sugar claims, to mulct the Government out of $4,000,000. [Applause.] If it had not been for that we never would have gotten a rule even to consume those two days. That is the diligence of the Committee on Agriculture, and that is the procedure of your steering committee, and the procedure of your majority members of the Committee on Rules. To take care of some fellows who have private bills, who gambled in sugar and lost $4,000,000, we got two days in which to consider important bills.

I say that in this amendment we are giving the Secretary of Agriculture more than the Secretary of Agriculture asked when he went to the Senate. In the hearings Senator Jones of Washington asked the question:

I understand, Mr. Secretary, that the provision which the House committee reported and which went out on a point of order is what we put in the last bill.

The Secretary said it was. Then the question was asked:

You would like to have that renewed—

That referred to the provisions of the last bill, and the Secretary said he would, "Very much, indeed."

What was the provision of the last bill? It provided for a maximum salary of $6,500 in scientific work, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, but for the fiscal year 1923 8 men should receive a salary in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500, and 3 men in excess of $5,500. That is what the Secretary asked for the other day before the Senate committee. Instead of having 8 men in excess of $5,000, they put in 12, and instead of 3 men in excess of $5,500 you have put in five. You have given the Secretary of Agriculture more than he asked for.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman knows that the number is exactly in accordance with the recommendations which the Secretary of Agriculture made to the Budget and the Budget made to the Congress.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not know anything about the Budget, but you gave him more than he asked for.

Mr. ANDERSON. We have not given anything yet.

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; but you are making an assault with attempts to, and I hope that you will fail. [Applause.] What does the bill which the Committee on Agriculture reported after days of hearings, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and with the approval of all who appeared before that committee, provide for? We did not give carte blanc to the Secretary to increase to the amount of $6,500, 2,500 men engaged in scientific work in the Department of Agriculture. Here is what we gave: Not more than seven in excess of $4,500 and not to exceed $5,000; not more than five in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $5,500; not more than three in excess of $5,500 but not in excess of $6,000; and in no case was the salary to exceed $6,000. We gave him the right to increase the salaries set out there of 15 men only that are engaged in scientific work. I have nothing against the Secretary of Agriculture. I have a high regard for him. I have said privately, and I say it now, I think he is the best man in the Cabinet, but I am against the idea of the legislative committees of this House losing their functions every day. I owe just as much responsibility to the people I represent as any member of the Committee on Appropriations does, and so does every other man in this House. [Applause.] Are we going to sit supinely and let these departments, whichever one it may be, ignore the committee appointed for the consideration of business applying to the particular department and run over to the other body, just because it is in order to get an amendment tacked on, where we can not make a point of order under our rules, because it is not against the Senate rules, and ignore the proper legislative committees of the House? Then, to add insult to injury, are we to sit supinely, as the chairman of the subcommittee has asked you to do to-day, and increase the appropriation, and not only that, but to make it permanent forever and a day after the year 1924?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. What increase over the amount reported from the Committee on Agriculture is there; how many officers?

Mr. BLANTON. Over $4,000,000 increase in this bill over what the House passed.

Mr. BUTLER. And we have to consider that all in an hour?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will answer the gentleman. Under Senate amendment No. 31 we give to the Secretary of Agriculture carte blanche authority, if he wants to exercise it, to increase the compensation of every employee in the scientific work in the Department of Agriculture to the amount of $6,500 after 1924.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman know how many scientific employees there are?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I just read that a short time ago.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman is in error. The report from the Department of Agriculture states that a year ago—December, 1921—there were 3,778.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This says that there are 2,500 technical scientists, and so forth.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And this would permit an increase of $2,000 for every one of them, or a total increase of $7,500,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As I say, that gives him the power to do that, but our bill limits it to 15; and, as I say, I have high regard for the Secretary of Agriculture. However, I serve notice upon him, and upon the Department of Agriculture, that so far as I am concerned individually, as a member of the Agricultural Committee, if they want cooperation they must come to the committee that is empowered to act for them.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with the Committee on Appropriations, nor have I any suggestions to make as to the present system. The only suggestion I have to offer is that the committee should observe the law and live up to the spirit of the law and the rule. The committees on legislation have been criticized for not reporting legislation. It has been suggested that the Committee on Agriculture reported a bill similar to the one that is under consideration. The committee did; it carried an increase of salary for nine people in the department, all that was asked for by the department. After conference with Doctor Ball we wrote into the bill exactly what was suggested and added one, Doctor Ball, to the list, giving everything that was requested. We expected that the representatives of the department would act in good faith and make their contract good with the committee. Instead of that evidently the agreement made was overlooked, and for some reason or other the numbers were increased. If all had acted in accordance with agreement made with the committee, there would have been no controversy about this matter.

Section 1 of the bill reported by the committee gave the Secretary authority to increase the salaries of 15 scientific investigators whose salaries are at present limited to $4,500, as follows: Not more than 7 in excess of $4,500, but not in excess of $5,000 each.

Not more than five in excess of $5,000, but not in excess of $5,500 each.

Not more than three in excess of $5,500, but not in excess of $6,000 each.

The increases in salaries authorized for the current year were 8 in excess of $5,000, but not in excess of $5,500, or an increase of 3 over the number agreed upon, and the number of increases suggested in the Senate amendments are 12, or 7 more than the number agreed upon. The number of increases ranging from $5,500 to $6,000 were increased to 5 for the current year, at a salary from $5,500 to $6,500, and the same number are provided for in the proposed Senate amendments.

Section 2 of the bill reported authorizes the increase of salary of nine officers of the Department of Agriculture who were on the statutory roll of the department, were seven chiefs and the librarian and, as before stated, Doctor Ball, director of scientific work, was added to the list submitted. Salaries were fixed as suggested and as follows:

Title.	Present salary.	Salary proposed.
Director of Scientific Work.....	$5,000	$6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.....	5,000	6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry.....	5,000	6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Forestry.....	5,000	6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry.....	5,000	6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Markets.....	5,000	6,000
Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey.....	4,000	4,500
Chief of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements.....	4,000	4,000
Librarian.....	2,000	2,500

What is the suggestion at this time? The representative of the department asked for increases, and indicated, as has been stated, the proposed amendment would make it possible to increase the salary of 3,778 employees of the department $2,000 each, or more than $7,500,000. We have heard a good deal about economy. I believe some of you probably discussed it in the last campaign. I doubt, my friends, you can satisfy your constituents by decreasing the appropriation for the control and eradication of hog cholera more than $100,000; no increase in appropriation for the control and eradication for tuberculin testing of animals, or for the payment of indemnities; and only $25,000 increase to exterminate the corn borer, thus giving the corn borer, now invading the Corn Belt, the right of way; and, on the other hand, authorizing the increase of salary of 3,778 employees, or $7,500,000 increase in salary. I believe that is all I care to say. I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret to find myself in an emphatic disagreement with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and my Democratic colleagues who have spoken. If there ever was a time when agriculture should not be handled lightly, it is now. Everybody is talking about helping the farmer, and I doubt exceedingly the wisdom of doing this injustice to the Department of Agriculture because we are not pleased with the proceedings of the Senate and the House. There has been a great deal said here in criticism of the Secretary of Agriculture for going to the Senate. But, gentlemen, the Secretary of Agriculture came to the Committee on Agriculture and that committee had exhaustive hearings and reported a bill, unanimously favorable, covering the general purpose of this amendment under consideration. The facts are, and I am not criticizing anybody, but the facts are the bill has been on the Calendar of the House nearly a year, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has not gotten it up for the consideration of the House.

And I am not here to criticize the chairman or the Secretary of Agriculture. But after the Secretary had waited nearly a year and gotten no action in the House, then why should he not go to the Senate and try to get some recognition?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman knows the chairman is not at liberty to call up a bill. The chairman has acted on orders made by the committee to call up bills as directed by that committee.

Mr. ASWELL. The committee reported the bill favorably and it has been on the calendar nearly a year. I thought that action was an order.

Mr. HAUGEN. The committee reported about 20 other bills which have not been considered on calls of committees.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely state the facts, that this bill has not received consideration by the House. The gentleman from Iowa has not gotten it up.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ASWELL. In just a moment. There has been criticism for putting legislation upon an appropriation bill. My own opinion, my own judgment, is clear; the way out of this dilemma, the way out of all this mass of confusion, is to abolish the Committee on Appropriations of 35 and put the authority back to the nine committees, where it belongs. [Applause.] And I for one in the new Congress will do my part to bring that to pass. Now, gentlemen, I want to call attention to this fact: The Secretary of Agriculture asks for some additional salaries at $6,500 a year. This very Congress has authorized salaries in one of the departments of this Government of $25,000 a year, and others at $20,000 in that department, and here, because the Secretary of Agriculture appeals to the Congress for a salary of $6,500 a year, you criticize the Secretary and make it appear he has committed some crime. I for one, under the conditions of agriculture in this country to-day, would be willing to vote for the Secretary of Agriculture to get 10, 12, or 20 people at $6,500 a year in order that he may transact the business and help agriculture in this country. [Applause.] Again, you will observe that there is no provision in this amendment that authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to increase a number of people to $3,500, as some have stated, because he can not increase any salary until he comes back to Congress and gets authority.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman contend that the first part of this amendment did not give him the right in his discretion to increase every scientific employee he wants to up to $6,500?

Mr. ASWELL. Provided he can get the money from Congress. Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman say he is in favor of this increase? Does the gentleman undertake to say to the House he is in favor of making this permanent without giving any hearings at all?

Mr. ASWELL. I made no such statement, and intimated no such thing. I said the word "hereafter" should be stricken from this amendment, and I said that if the Secretary of Agriculture believes he can bring some additional body of men into the department at this great crisis in agriculture to assist in promoting the agricultural welfare of this country, I am willing to give him a chance to do it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman that the parliamentary situation developed so that I wanted to give the gentleman an opportunity to vote what he is advocating.

Mr. ASWELL. I will vote to cut out the word "hereafter" and as far as criticizing the Secretary in regard to the number of five men for $6,500 each, I am for it, and if the Secretary wants 10 he may have them, and if the Secretary of Agriculture comes to Congress and says he wants 20 I will be for that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think that we will agree that if you strike out the word "hereafter" making it permanent law, I am in favor of giving the Secretary all the assistance he thinks is necessary. But the gentleman is aware of the fact that the Congress in making up the appropriations has adopted a suggestion that makes it possible for the Secretary to increase every one of them up to $6,500 if the appropriations are made.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman would not make that statement seriously if he understood the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back the remainder of his time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the amendment to provide higher salaries for scientific men. It is now at $4,500, altogether too low. That situation has existed for many years. It has been impossible under it for the department to engage, or to keep very long, competent men. The Secretary is constantly embarrassed by not being able to pay salaries high enough.

With that in mind, the officials of the department asked the Committee on Agriculture to prepare a bill. The committee did prepare a bill, and, as has been stated on the floor, that bill has been on the calendar for 9 or 10 months, but no action has been taken on it. As prepared by the committee it was satisfactory to the department, as I remember their testimony, although by it the limit would be raised to only $5,500, an increase of only $1,000, whereas my amendment would raise it to $6,500. The department was also satisfied with the further limitation which the bill carries—that is, only so many at the $5,500 rate, and only so many at $5,000; the remainder, I presume, to stay at $4,500, or less.

Now the Senate amendment provides a limit of $6,500, $1,000 more than the department itself wished, as I remember it, a year ago. But I approve the Senate amendment. Six thousand five hundred dollars is not too large. I approve of the use of the word "hereafter," to make the law permanent. But my opinion is that some limitation ought to be placed upon it, so that the condition that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. HAUGEN] says may arise can not be permitted, by opening the door wide, allowing the Secretary of Agriculture the discretion of placing a very large number of men on the roll at the limit of $6,500.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I can not; there are certain things I wish to say, and my time is limited.

Now, as to the limit of $6,500, I would amend the Senate amendment. If one has the bill before him, he can see what I wish. If he has the Senate amendment before him in print, he can see what I mean. I will state it differently. In the bill I would strike out the words "for the fiscal year 1924," and, on the next page, I would strike out "$5,500," so that if the Senate amendment is adopted, amended as I suggest, it would read:

That the limit shall be $6,500: Provided, That no salary shall be paid under this paragraph at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000 except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $6,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each.

It would make the limit of $6,500 permanent, but I would make $6,500 available for the next fiscal year, whereas the Senate amendment, favored by the gentleman from Minnesota

[Mr. ANDERSON] will not make it available until 1925. It would make the qualification as to the number permanent and permit the paying of salaries of 12 up to $6,500 and the salaries of 5 at $5,500. Those 12 and 5 are 17, which is 6 more than the Secretary of Agriculture himself asked for only a short time ago; several more—I do not have in mind the exact number—than the Secretary of Agriculture approved at the time the bill was under consideration by the Committee on Agriculture. At the proper time I shall offer that amendment and ask its adoption. If adopted it will provide the higher salaries to more men than does any other proposal now before the House, and these higher salaries may be paid one year earlier than is possible under any other proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, the only opposition I have to this Senate amendment No. 31 is to the language that makes it permanent law, and I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] is going to ask for a division of the question, and if the House votes to recede, then he will move to recede and concur with an amendment making these salary changes apply only to the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In a moment I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Now, the reason why this amendment should be adopted as permanent law is the fact that it gives the Secretary of Agriculture the broad and inclusive power to classify all scientific employees in any classification that he sees fit, provided that the salaries are under $6,500.

The House has already passed the bill known as the Lehlbach reclassification bill, which provides the machinery for reclassifying all of the Government employees, and one of the classifications is the scientific class. Now, some Members—a good many Members—voted against that bill because they thought the salaries provided were too high. And yet if the House passes this pending amendment you are giving the Secretary of Agriculture much broader authority than was given to any head of a department in the reclassification bill. I have the reclassification bill here as it passed the House, and it provides for six different grades of professional men, and there is but one grade that would draw up to $6,500, and that grade is grade 6, which would include a very limited number of employees. Let me read it to you. The only class that would draw that amount is grade 6, in the professional class, which may be referred to as the chief professional grade. I read:

It shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to act as the scientific and administrative head of a major professional or scientific bureau.

There are but few employees in the Government service that could go as high as $6,600, and those would be such as the Chief of the Bureau of Standards and, perhaps, the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry and the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, in the Department of Agriculture, and administrative positions of that kind.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman that if this bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture shall become a law everyone in excess of $6,000 comes within the purview of that.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and if my friend from Kentucky will permit, the pending amendment would give to the Secretary of Agriculture complete authority to make a reclassification of all the scientific employees in his department. I am not saying the Secretary of Agriculture would abuse the authority. What I say is that it is not the policy of Congress to grant such powers. What Congress needs to do is to enact the reclassification bill which the House has already passed and then have a thorough, comprehensive reclassification of all Government employees.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. This amendment is for one year only. Does the gentleman fear there would be any difficulty in adding to the number, inasmuch as it ended this year?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; but after one fiscal year—

Mr. ASWELL. You would not favor cutting out the word "hereafter"?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I so stated.

Mr. ASWELL. Then you are in favor of one year only?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I explained that.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman believe that the Secretary of Agriculture could find a scientist of any value unless he gave him some permanent position? Does the gentleman think he could get a scientist to go there who would amount to anything?

Mr. BLACK. The point I am making is not against the particular salary schedule provided for the one fiscal year of 1924, but the bill goes further and provides for the Secretary of Agriculture to make a permanent classification limited only by a maximum of $6,500 salary. If Congress is going to provide a system of classification, it should be done in accordance with some such bill as the Committee on Agriculture brought before the House, or it should be done by such a bill as the Lehlbach reclassification bill. I am sure there are some very high class scientific men in the Department of Agriculture, but there are others equally as worthy in other departments and it does not seem to me the proper thing to merely favor one department. It is just that kind of piecemeal legislation which has occasioned so much complaint. I therefore hope that Senate amendment No. 31 to this bill, making permanent law, will not be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. One more question.

Mr. BLACK. My time has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this appropriation bill carries the appropriations to care for 15 scientists at above the $4,500.

Mr. KINCHELOE. For the year 1924.

Mr. TINCHER. For the year 1924. Now, there is some objection to the language authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to pay out that appropriation. There can be no question but that the Congress should legislate upon these salaries. The Committee on Agriculture reported out a bill which at any rate can not be said to be out of accord with what the appropriating committee has done this year, but the House has not passed that bill. The Committee on Agriculture, as I recall, was unanimous in reporting that bill, so no one is trampling on our toes. We have announced for the policy of paying these men. There may be something in the language of the appropriation bill calculated to make it permanent law; but the Agricultural Committee will still function, and if there is something wrong with that we will pass a law to cover it. We will not lose our jurisdiction. It will not be permanent unless the Committee on Agriculture is abolished.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TINCHER. In just a moment. What I do not understand is why every time when we try to appropriate a few thousand dollars here for a department in which everyone concedes there is efficiency, for a department at the head of which there is a man of whom even our friends on that side boast, we spend more time on it and there is more quibbling about it than there is over the expending of hundreds of millions of dollars in some other department.

I believe it would be all right to give the present head of the Agricultural Department $50,000,000 to use in the interests of agriculture. I believe we would be perfectly safe in making that appropriation. Finally, I do not want to go on record or be classified as one who is always finding some little work that is wrong and spending so much time in appropriating a little money for the Department of Agriculture. This bill does not carry an appropriation for 3,700 scientists at above $4,500. It only carries an appropriation for 15. The Committee on Agriculture has declared in favor of that. We did not give them all that they asked for when we reported out that bill, but we did report it out unanimously. What is the difference if we do forget that we had a bill? We appropriated for these men last year. The bill stays here on the calendar. This Congress has been busy. The Committee on Agriculture has had a great deal to do. Of course it did not call up this bill because there were others pressing. The committee has declared for this principle. What does the country care about which committee reported it out here? The committee has not been ignored. There is too much talk about this every time. And why is it that we always jump on poor old agriculture when we want to economize a little? [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. I just want to suggest on the question of the diligence of the Committee on Agriculture that the chairman of the committee tried to get this bill up on unanimous-consent day.

Mr. TINCHER. Probably some town boy objected to it, and the same fellow who objected will probably come in here to-day in holy horror and vote against appropriating this money for these men, while for some river and harbor project or some other expenditure he will vote $100,000,000 and never bat an eye. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman states that the Committee on Agriculture reported a bill declaring for this very proposition.

Mr. TINCER. Declaring for the principle of it, when we reported out the same 15. This appropriation carries only 15.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman states further that it was the unanimous action of the committee.

Mr. TINCER. Yes; I so understand it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I take it there were Democrats there?

Mr. TINCER. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They were for the bill?

Mr. TINCER. Yes. I am not accusing the Democrats of making this fight. This is not a party fight. There is always a fight when this bill comes up to give something to agriculture, and it does not come from any particular party. My friend from Texas knows it comes from all parties. The gentleman from Texas is with us in this matter.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And I will be with you in the future, too.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I know the gentleman does not mean to leave the impression that he did leave. The Agricultural Committee followed the principle in the proviso of the amendment, but this proviso applies only to 1924, and after that it is permanent law.

Mr. TINCER. It ought to be until we act on it. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, let us see how far we are in agreement. There has been no dissenting voice on the proposition that there should be power given to the Secretary of Agriculture to increase, as this amendment does increase, to $6,500 the amount of salaries to a certain number of men who are occupying scientific positions in the Department of Agriculture. What is the fear expressed in giving that authority to the Secretary? In the first place, objection is made because the provision makes it permanent law. It does make it permanent law, unless in any year the House of Representatives concludes that it would be unwise to continue it. At any time this can be changed by anyone who offers an amendment to reduce the amount of the appropriation if the House agrees to the amendment. It is within our power to change it if we see fit, or if it is shown at any time that an unnecessary number at the maximum rate are appointed.

Now, gentlemen, let us be sensible about this proposition. We ought to recognize this fact: The Department of Agriculture has been losing every year some of its most valuable men because of insufficient salary. It can not go to the scientific schools and ask them to send their best men here, because those men, on an average, get more than $6,000 a year.

They can not secure the men that they want and ought to have in the matter of scientific attainments because of the fact of insufficient salary. For that reason the Department of Agriculture is handicapped in the very place where it needs men of this character most and the country needs men of this character most. These men can not come or will not come at the present salaries unless you make this permanent legislation, because of the fact that they say, "It is true you will give me $6,500 next year, but I am sure of an increase and a permanent place at a larger salary where I am."

Now, gentlemen, can you trust the Secretary of Agriculture? That is the proposition. Let us see whether we can or not. During the last seven or eight years Secretaries of Agriculture have had the power to raise salaries to $4,500. Have they done that in many cases? There was a far greater temptation to do that than there would be to raise to $6,500, and a far greater necessity. And what is the fact? No man can say that during the seven or eight years, under different administrations, under three or four Secretaries of Agriculture, there has been a single man advanced even to that salary who was not entitled to it and approved; and the total number, I understand, is very small indeed.

So why do we hesitate? Why do you want to handicap the Secretary of Agriculture? You all say that you can trust him, and in your next breath you say you will not trust him. The great interests of this country demand that this department, which creates more wealth and which looks after the health of the people more carefully than all the other departments of the Government combined, shall have the benefit of this amendment, and yet you say to them, with the record of the Secretaries of the department during past years, you will not trust them. If at any time you think it is unnecessary or excessive or that wrong appointments have been made in the exercise of this power you can cut it off.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does not the gentleman think that Congress should retain the power and not transfer it to the Secretary of Agriculture? As the gentleman knows, in transferring it to the Secretary of Agriculture you put it out of the hands of Congress, and the gentleman knows that it is not the Secretary of Agriculture that we are transferring it to but some one in the department. Is it not safe to leave it in the hands of Congress?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not agree with my colleague in that regard. I think the Secretary's judgment in that regard far more valuable than that of Congressmen. It is absolutely important and necessary that this Congress should not handicap the Secretary in regard to this matter, because Congress has the right at any time, if he does the wrong thing or pursues a wrong policy, to stop it, and you can not tell what the circumstances may be as they arise.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the issue on this amendment is pretty clearly defined. I should like to make a few observations in reference to the amendment. The Agricultural Department, in the employment of its scientific force, comes in competition with all of the State universities and agricultural colleges throughout the United States. The general scale of salaries in universities for scientific men and in agricultural colleges is not only far above the $4,500 limitation, but far in excess of the $6,500 limitation proposed in this amendment. In addition, the Department of Agriculture, in getting scientific men, comes into competition with the great commercial institutions of the country. I am not contending that the department should pay salaries equal to commercial salaries, but I do think it should be put in a position to compete with the universities and the agricultural colleges in obtaining scientific men.

For example, the University of Pennsylvania pays a maximum salary of $7,000 or $8,000 for professors. The University of Wisconsin pays $7,500; Michigan, $7,500; Illinois, $7,000; California, $6,000; Ohio, $7,500; Cornell, $6,250. The Ohio State University pays $15,000 for its dean.

Now, let us get down to brass tacks on this proposition. Under existing law the salary of scientific men in the Department of Agriculture is limited to $4,500. That limitation was imposed in 1915, and it has been in effect about seven years. Has the department abused that limitation? Has it advanced a large portion of its scientific force to $4,500? As a matter of fact, in the seven years that provision has been applicable to the Department of Agriculture only 74 men, approximately 2 per cent of the total scientific force of the Department of Agriculture, have been advanced to a salary of $4,500. Now, this provision of $6,500 has been in effect for two years. Up to this time no one—not one man—in the Department of Agriculture has been appointed at a salary of $6,500. Under the limitation 20 men have been appointed at salaries of $5,000 and 6 of $5,500. In two years 35 men out of a total force of about 3,800, less than 1 per cent, have been advanced in salary, and none have been advanced to the maximum. The provision will cost the Government just $20,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I agree with my colleague heartily that the salaries ought to be increased, but—

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman wants to limit the salaries so that it would absolutely tie up the Department of Agriculture to a fixed and limited schedule of salaries for all time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. My amendment would put more men on a higher salary than the Secretary of Agriculture ever asked for and more than does the gentleman's bill. I will say this—

Mr. ANDERSON. I decline to yield further. I have only 10 minutes and I want to use them. Why do gentlemen want to impose a limit on the Department of Agriculture which they do not impose on any other department? There are 7,700 men in other departments who are getting more than $5,000. Yet the Committee on Agriculture, which is supposed to have the interests of the agriculture of this country at heart, proposes to limit salaries in the Department of Agriculture above $5,000 to 15 for all time. It is so absurd that I am surprised that anybody should suggest it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The Secretary of Agriculture's suggestion to our committee would not give as much liberality as my amendment would give it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know what the Secretary of Agriculture proposed to the gentleman's committee. I do not think that he ever proposed to hamstring the department. I have no criticism of the Committee on Agriculture; it is charged with legislation in the interest of agriculture and it ought to have the substantial interests of agriculture at heart. I want it to have a chance to give some new consideration to this question. I would like to see if the Committee on Agriculture really wants to deal fairly with the matter. I would like to find out whether it is willing to give the Department of Agriculture the same opportunity, the same power, with respect to salaries as is given to other heads of departments.

Mr. Speaker, because I want to give them that opportunity, because I would really like to see them demonstrate whether they are in favor of a policy of reasonable liberality with respect to salaries of scientific men in the Department of Agriculture, I am going to move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which will limit the application of these salaries to one year, and I hope the Agricultural Committee will get together and consider this question from a reasonable point of view and bring out a piece of legislation here that will adequately deal with the situation.

Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

" MAXIMUM SALARIES.

" During the fiscal year 1924 the maximum salary of any scientific investigator or other employee engaged in scientific work and paid from the general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed at the rate of $6,500 per annum: Provided, That for the fiscal year 1924 no salary shall be paid under this paragraph at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000, except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Would it be in order at this time to congratulate the gentleman upon offering this amendment now?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask for a division of the main question when it is put.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, and the gentleman from Texas demands a division. The first question is on the motion to recede.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 128, noes 1.

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on concurring in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, can we have the amendment again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 33: Page 83, beginning with line 11, strike out the remainder of the page and lines 1, 2, 3, and 4 on page 83 and insert: "Forest roads and trails: For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, and as authorized by paragraph 2 of section 4 of the act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 19, 1922, to be available until expended, $6,500,000."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREST ROADS AND TRAILS.

For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, $3,000,000, to be available until expended, being part of the sum of $6,500,000 authorized to be appro-riated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, by paragraph 2 of section 4 of the act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 19, 1922: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, immediately upon the approval of this act, also to apportion and prorate among the several States, Alaska, and Porto Rico, as provided in section 23 of said Federal highway act, the sum of $3,500,000, constituting the remainder of the said authorization of $6,500,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may incur obligations, approve projects, or enter into contracts under his apportionment and prorating of this authorization, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof: Provided further, That the appropriations heretofore, herein, and hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 8 of the act of July 11, 1916, and of section 23 of the Federal highway act of November 9, 1921, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligations created hereunder in any State or Territory: Provided further, That the total expenditures on account of any State or Territory shall at no time exceed its authorized apportionment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the House carried a provision for forest roads, which made an appropriation of $3,000,000, on account of the authorization of $6,500,000 for the next fiscal year. It carried with that provision a proviso which authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to apportion and prorate among the States the balance of the authorization, amounting to $3,500,000. The Senate made a straight appropriation of $6,500,000 on the item. When we came to examine the proposition we found that the language which the House carries was not sufficient to accomplish the purpose we had in mind. Under existing law the appropriations are apportioned and prorated to the States, on the basis specified in the law, for the construction of highways which complete the State highway system and for forest roads and trails for purposes of fire protection. The consequence of this situation was that we had tied up in the proposition a considerable amount of money which was not needed for payment upon contracts which were coming due within the fiscal year. The object of this amendment is to make the total sums already appropriated available interchangeably in any State or upon any contract. The program is now going forward at the rate of $10,000,000 a year. This will give the department something over $11,000,000 to apply on those contracts during the next fiscal year.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In what respect does this amendment change the bill from the way it passed the House?

Mr. ANDERSON. It does not change it at all. It simply conforms to some suggestions made by the Forest Service, in order to comply with the methods they are operating under down there.

Mr. DOWELL. The substance of this amendment is the same as was contained in the original bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And this will not deprive the fund in any way of the full amount of authorization of last June?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; it will not.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, was submitting some observations early in the day on the provision in this bill relative to the pecan industry of the United States. I am advised, however, that he stated that Texas produced 90 per cent of the pecans produced in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Commercial pecans.

Mr. CRISP. There is no way of differentiating between the commercial and the other pecans, so far as statistics are concerned. Texas is a great State and I rejoice in any good that befalls it. Of course, I think Georgia is a greater State. I have just phoned to the Census Office and to the Agricultural Department to get the statistics as to the production of pecans, simply for the purpose of keeping the record straight. The last available statistics were for the year 1919. Both the Census Office and the Agricultural Department advise me that in 1919 there were produced in the United States 31,808,508 pounds of pecans; that the great State of Texas produced 16,757,421 pounds, which is a fraction over 50 per cent. Of the rest, Georgia produced 2,544,377 pounds; Oklahoma, 4,296,647 pounds; Louisiana, 2,242,859 pounds; Florida, 1,025,673 pounds; and Mississippi, 155,245 pounds.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will get the hearings that were passed at the meeting called by Doctor Quintance, who is at the head of this department, with reference to the removal of the pecan laboratory from Texas, he will see that the evidence there, just a month ago, was that Texas produces about 90 per cent of the commercial pecans of the United States.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and urged this appropriation. I did not read or know of any such evidence, but I know that the statistician of the Department of Agriculture has just advised me as to these figures, and told me he had no later figures. Now, I wanted, for the purpose of keeping the record straight, to put these figures in. The pecan industry in my State is a new one, comparatively new, and only for the last four or five years has it been enlarging. It is now growing very rapidly. I have no doubt Georgia raised twice as many pecans last year as she did in 1919. In my section there are a number of pecan orchards containing 2,000 acres. One of them is partially owned by one of our colleagues in this House [Mr. McFADDEN, of Pennsylvania], and no State and no country is producing larger, finer, or more delicious pecans than the State of Georgia. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. LOWREY. Will not the gentleman at least agree that his colleague, the gentleman from Texas, comes from the nuttiest State in the Union? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Except Mississippi.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It may have been asked this morning, and therefore—

Mr. ANDERSON. I never object to answering questions twice if I can answer them the same way each time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to know if the appropriation of $700,000 as proposed by the Senate for market news service is sufficient to extend the service into my State and in some of the Southeastern States?

Mr. ANDERSON. The amount appropriated is sufficient to extend to all parts of the United States the existing telegraphic service on fruits, vegetables, and live stock.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So I am justified in the conclusion that the purpose of the legislation at least is to give this extension in the service?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but the gentleman must realize that it only extends the existing service and does not involve any new service.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps it would not apply to Virginia and some of these other points.

Mr. ANDERSON. It would depend somewhat upon the character of the production.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think that service is provided for in these various State colleges. Is that right?

Mr. ANDERSON. All I can say about it is that the purpose of the Senate amendment was to extend the existing service to the sections of the country which do not now have it, which includes the southeastern, the intermountain section, the west coast, and the southwest.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from my State college about this matter we are talking about.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

STATE COOPERATION IN MARKETING WORK IN NORTH CAROLINA.

DIVISION OF MARKETS AND RURAL ORGANIZATION.

Raleigh, N. C., January 22, 1923.

[North Carolina State College of Agriculture and Engineering and bureau of markets and State department of agriculture cooperating.]

Hon. C. L. ABERNETHY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For several years we have been attempting to supply the growers of this State with market information on a few of the leading crops during the shipping season. Because of the very great expense of the ordinary telegraph service we have had to limit this work to strawberries, white potatoes, and peaches, giving about a three weeks' service on each. Our growers have constantly clamored for a more continued service and have asked us to include daily market information on all the farm crops, but this will be impracticable without we are able to secure an extension of the Federal leased-wire service into this State.

For some time the leased-wire service of the United States Department of Agriculture has been available to the New England, North Atlantic, East North Central, and West North Central States. Then during the war it was extended to the Pacific coast and recently a special appropriation has been made to take it into the State of Texas. Mr. J. H. Meek, of the Virginia Division of Markets, states that for this service the Federal Government has expended as follows:

1919	1, 171, 920
1920	322, 920
1921	403, 920
1922	390, 000

It is anticipated that $405,000 plus $20,000 for the extension of the service into the State of Texas will be expended in 1923, and $401,400 in 1924, as per estimates placed before Congress.

Mr. Meek recently made a trip to Washington to determine if it would be possible to add a provision on the present appropriation for extending this leased wire into North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, Florida, and Mississippi. It was estimated at least $150,000 would be required for this purpose.

Do you not feel that the truck growers of the southeastern section are being discriminated against somewhat by not having this service?

At the present time we are very well equipped for broadcasting radio news inasmuch as the State college station here is one of the best in America. We are unable to use it, however, except very slightly, because of the enormous cost of collecting market information. The State of North Carolina might be financially able to pay for an extension of the leased wire into Raleigh, but we feel that all of the States in this section need the same service and that it will be much cheaper to provide for all at the same time.

We trust that you will see fit to inquire into this matter and assure you that if this service can be extended into Raleigh, the division of markets will abundantly care for the dissemination of market prices to the growers throughout the State.

Very truly yours,

GORRELL SHUMAKER,
Acting Chief, Division of Markets.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 34: On page 84 of the bill after line 10 insert:

"Purchase of seeds for drought-stricken areas: That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, for the crop of 1923, to make advances or loans to farmers in the drought-stricken areas of the State of Washington and of the State of New Mexico, where he shall find that special need for such assistance exists, for the purchase of wheat for seed purposes in the State of Washington and the purchase of pinto beans for seed purposes in the State of New Mexico, and, when necessary to procure such seed and sell same to such farmers. Such advances, loans, or sales shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, including an agreement by each farmer to use the seed thus obtained by him for the production of crops. A first lien on the crop to be produced from seed obtained through a loan, advance, or sale made under this section shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security therefor. All such advances or loans shall be made through such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate. For carrying out the purposes of this paragraph, to be immediately available (not more than $100,000 of which shall be available to procure pinto bean seeds), $550,000.

"That any persons who shall knowingly make any false representation for the purpose of obtaining an advance, loan, or sale under the preceding paragraph shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months or both."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion, to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves further to insist on its disagreement, and the gentleman from Washington makes a preferential motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, as to whether this policy of Federal aid to drought-stricken farmers is a sound policy or not I need not now discuss, because we have already established that policy during the two preceding years. This Congress in 1921 appropriated for the drought-stricken wheat farmers of Montana and the Dakotas and Idaho $2,000,000. In 1922 we appropriated for the same purpose $1,500,000. During 1922 there were loans to 6,554 farmers in the State of Montana, $756,000. In South Dakota to 4,977 wheat farmers, $661,000, and North Dakota to 431 farmers, $37,600.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Are drought conditions in the State of Washington as severe as in the State of New Mexico?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am not familiar with conditions in New Mexico.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There was 1 inch of rain in that State in the last 15 months, and I will state to my friend that if the conditions are as bad in his State as in the State of New Mexico, the people need this help and I am for it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I thank the gentleman. I want to state the conditions a little further. The loans which were made to drought-stricken farmers in the States just referred to have been productive of splendid results. I drove through all of those States last summer. I found a good wheat crop growing, which later matured, and they harvested millions of bushels of wheat, the best crop they have had in many years.

And I learned further—in fact, I was told by a Member of this House only two days ago—that hundreds and hundreds of those farmers have been enabled to remain on their farms instead of having to go into bankruptcy, lose their stock, lose their machinery, lose their farms, and the farms have not remained idle.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to go a little further first.

The situation in the State of Washington is this: In most of the wheat-growing portions of the State of Washington we have the very best and most productive wheat lands to be found anywhere in the United States. Statistics bear me out in this statement. But there is an area including some five or six counties which has been suffering for the past six years. For five years in succession they had a shortage of moisture. In 1922 the rainfall was so limited that they had almost a complete failure and produced only from 1 to 4 bushels per acre over a part of this area.

The banks took care of those farmers during all of these years.

The merchants carried them. The millers carried them. But they have all gone down together. Now, if that condition were going to continue, certainly the Federal Government would not be justified, nor would anyone else be justified, in helping them to seed a crop at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The situation at this time is this: After putting forth every effort to purchase seed wheat, they succeeded in seeding last fall all but about 400,000 acres. It has cost them to plow, harrow, cultivate that land and prepare it for seeding, according to the farming methods out there, not less than $1,500,000. But I am informed they will not be able to seed this spring unless they secure outside help.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. A little later, if you please. I asked for and have received numerous affidavits from wheat growers of many years' standing in that section of the State, and I appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and laid the information before the committee. The Secretary of Agriculture has asked for this relief, and the Senate has written this amendment into this appropriation bill.

The weather conditions are the all-important matter there. The soil is all right. After these six years the drought is now broken. They have already been having unusual rains, and they had a very heavy snowfall at a time when the ground was not frozen, so that when the snow melted the moisture went into the ground, and there is every prospect of a good crop this summer, if we are willing to do for these farmers exactly what we have done for their neighbors across the State line during the past two years.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. The question I wanted to ask was whether these loans, made to these farmers in other States, are being paid back?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I understand they are being paid back at the rate of many thousands of dollars every day.

I provided in the bill which I introduced that the loans should bear 5 per cent interest and should be repayable by November 1. This amendment, which was inserted in the bill by the Senate, provides, of course, for a first mortgage on the growing crop, or the Secretary may require any other security that he thinks is necessary to secure the Government.

Now, gentlemen, this is the situation: These farmers are in exactly the same condition as were the farmers across the line. By our action the farmers in the other States were able to grow a good crop and are reestablished in their farming operations. These men—hundreds and hundreds of them—are absolutely down and out unless they can get a little outside aid. Their condition is not a consequence of any fault of theirs. They have done the best they could. They have made every effort possible, and the community has done the best it could for them. But they have come to the point where they are not able to go out and purchase the necessary seed wheat so that they can seed these 400,000 acres and grow a crop this year.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Have these lands produced good crops before this period of drought? Have they been proven to be good wheat lands?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The figures submitted show crops of 15 to 20 bushels per acre and as high as 35 or 40 bushels an acre previous to this drought. It is not that these lands are unproductive—they are productive—but there has been a shortage of moisture during these years.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. This amendment may not be looked upon as a privileged one to the farmers alone; but is it not for the benefit of the American people?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; it is for the benefit of the American people. I trust my motion will be sustained. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the position in which my friend from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] finds himself. But this is not a Federal proposition, and it is not one that justifies a Federal appropriation. There are four or five counties in the State of Washington where, as I understand it, they have not had a crop for five years, where the banks had made loans, and the situation is rather badly tied up. But, if we make these loans, we would do substantially as we did before and help the banks rather than the farmers, for, after all, these loans will mean that the banker has better security, and in some cases the farmer will pay his note at the bank and borrow money for seed from the Government.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that if we enable the farmer who has been putting forth his best efforts to put in a crop and to remain on his farm rather than to lose everything, when there is every prospect that this can be repaid, and will be repaid this fall, we shall do about the right thing? It seems to me the fact that it is a smaller area should not militate against the passage of this. Two years ago we appropriated $2,000,000 and last year we appropriated $1,500,000, and now we are asking for $450,000 for that same class of farmers.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, when we made the prior appropriation for seed loans the proposition was one covering hundreds of thousands of acres, in which several States were interested, and some of those States practically admitted their bankruptcy and inability to deal with the situation. Now, I do not suppose that the State of Washington, with its legislature in session, is admitting its inability to deal with these farmers in four or five counties in the eastern part of the State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think, on the contrary, that the State legislature in the State of Washington is at this time endeavoring to memorialize Congress in reference to this situation.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do they not memorialize the State?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They have. If the gentleman will give me one minute, I will say that the drought-stricken counties in the State of Washington are, perhaps, 200 miles from where I live. When I got home to the State of Washington last fall, after being here and away from it for two years, I was very much surprised to find the extent of the drought and distress in eastern Washington. I found that five or six counties had gone to the mat in the effort to carry themselves through those bad years. I found only four bank failures. There had been the most tremendous financial effort to hold up those counties. Of course, the other banks helped and to the limit in the effort to enable them to hold their own and not make necessary an appeal to the Nation. Now we come with a modest request, which has been agreed to in the Senate, and we come with an almost certain pledge—agreeing to pay interest—that this money can be returned this winter. We base this appeal on the precedent of the help for other States. We make it because we know that this Congress has been desirous of helping the farmers. We can not do any more than present the merits of the case. We make the appeal to the membership to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, remembering that at the same time there is an item here on behalf of New Mexico, whose Representative in Congress died only a few days ago and can not speak for himself. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] will prevail.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, of course everyone in this House sympathizes with the situation, but there must be an end somewhere to the Federal Government being the Santa Claus of everybody who happens to be in distress. There are people in distress in my district. There are people in distress in every district in the United States. Why pick out four counties in Washington and a little piece of New Mexico and deal with them? If we are going to loan to people who are in distress, why not pass legislation which will deal with all the States and all of the people who are in distress and who need loans?

And let me just say to my good friends on the Committee on Agriculture that here is a place where they can very properly assert their jurisdiction. If the salary item was legislation, this is more legislation. This is a matter which ought to receive the consideration of the Committee on Agriculture if it ought to receive the consideration of any committee.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It has been before the Committee on Agriculture, but it has never got out of that committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that answers the question. There is nothing more to be said about it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The answer is in exactly the same way that the preceding question was answered. The committee failed to take action. I was assured that there would have been a favorable report at the time this was presented to the committee, but there was no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is that there was a distinct understanding when the last loan was made that no other applications would come to the House, and there ought not to be any consideration of this one now.

Mr. SNELL. What proportion of the previous loans have been paid?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That is what I want to know, too.

Mr. ANDERSON. In November, 1922, 42 per cent of the 1921 loan had been paid and 30 per cent of the 1922 loan had been paid.

Mr. SNYDER. What was the term of the loan when it was made?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it went to the crop year, approximately six months.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In 1921 their drought continued. In 1922 they made a crop, and before their marketing time had half passed they had repaid almost half of the loans for the two years. In November the wheat is not all marketed by any manner of means, not half of it marketed, and everybody knows who is familiar with conditions that they did not make a crop in 1921 and could not pay, but in 1922 they did.

Mr. SNYDER. If that is so, there was no idea of paying the loan when it was supposed to come due.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. When they made a crop they paid the loan. Surely no bad faith can be charged against them for not paying in 1921 when they had nothing with which to pay.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, I want to suggest that under the previous appropriations made, chiefly in Montana, when it came to repaying the loan the Government was obliged to spend considerable money to make collections, and in many cases encountered obstacles put in its way by the banks who were so largely the beneficiaries of this kind of legislation. Instead of coming to the aid of the Federal Government and cooperating in getting the money repaid they were far from cooperating, as the hearings held before the Committee on Appropriations will demonstrate.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is unquestionably true, Mr. Speaker. This is clearly not a Federal proposition.

I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. A preferential motion was made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] on which the vote will come first, that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 13, strike out the figures "$69,068,053" and insert "$73,741,653."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDERSON moves to recede and concur with the following amendment: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert $69,536,653.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion. The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McLEAN, Mr. PEPPER, and Mr. FLETCHER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 4114) for the relief of Bertha N. Rich, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13926, the legislative appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 13926, making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. The Senate has placed numerous, not a few, but numerous, legislative items on this bill, going up to an enormous sum of money.

Mr. MADDEN. The amount put on by the Senate is about $100,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, more than that.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; it is a relatively small amount, about $100,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I have been misinformed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Claims:

S. 4114. An act for the relief of Bertha N. Rich.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that private pension bills in order to-day may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that private pension bills in order to-day may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That request applies to H. R. 12887?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; this is a private pension bill to correct a mistake made in a former bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And it does not apply to a legislative bill?

Mr. FULLER. It applies to this bill and an omnibus bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JACOB F. ROSENBERGER.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12887, granting a pension to Jacob F. Rosenberger.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob F. Rosenberger, helpless and dependent son of Frederick Rosenberger, late of Company B, One hundred and thirty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, the reason for this bill is that there was a clerical mistake in the same case which was included in an omnibus bill passed in the second session of the Congress and which became a law on the 18th day of September last. In that bill the name was given as Joseph F. Rosenberger when it should have been Jacob. The bill is to correct that mistake, and I offer an amendment at the end of the section striking out the period, inserting a comma, and adding "from the 18th of September, 1922."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "month" strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the words "from the 18th day of September, 1922."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, Mr. H. N. Owen, editor of Farm, Stock and Home, Minneapolis, delivered a very thoughtful and convincing address in favor of a controlled production at the Tri-State Grain Growers' Convention, held this month at Fargo, N. Dak.:

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE TRISTATE GRAIN GROWERS' CONVENTION, FARGO, N. DAK., THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1923.

In a short story by Ambrose Bierce he develops a situation in which the leading character battles with an unseen enemy. He is constantly aware of its presence; it thwarts all his efforts to shake it loose, and all of the plans that he tries out to kill and eliminate this unseen enemy are futile.

Now, it seems to me that agriculture is in a good deal the same situation as the man in this story. It is battling an unseen enemy. We have a situation in this country that should give us prosperous agriculture. We have, next to Russia, the largest area of possible farming land in the world. We have a large consuming population. We have means of rapid transportation. We have an intelligent class of farmers. I believe the most intelligent class of farmers of any country in the world, and yet the returns to farmers are less than the returns that come to any other line of productive enterprise.

I believe that before I get through I will bring this unseen enemy that now apparently has such a hold on the throat of agriculture out in plain view. I will go further than merely showing it to you. I will suggest a remedy. I will suggest a means of killing and doing away with this enemy.

First, however, I want to pay some attention to the various remedies proposed to help out farmers at this time. Let us examine, first of all, for a few minutes, the credit situation. Congress is busy working on credit legislation, hoping that by giving farmers access to more money at lower interest rates, they can tide themselves over the present crisis. Now, I believe nearly everyone in this room know my sentiments on credit and the necessity of cheap money for farmers, but unless there is a chance of making money on borrowed money, ability to borrow is not going to solve the problem. Borrowing money to lose simply prolongs the struggles of the borrower, and he keeps working and hoping that in some mysterious way the tide will turn and enable him to pay his debts. When the deflation started in the fall of 1920, I fully believed that greater credit facilities to enable farmers to tide over the deflation period was necessary and desirable. I believed at that time that agriculture was being deflated first and that all other lines of industry would follow in due course. Unfortunately, however, that has not been the case. In manufacturing there was some decline in prices of manufactured goods, but for the last six months there is every indication that manufacturing has stood all the deflation that we can expect to see. Prices of many articles have started up. There has been in some lines a slight revival of business in the last quarter of 1922, and this revival may extend into the first half of the present year, but agriculture has not as yet shown a proportional rise from its deflation, so that instead of the price of what the farmer buys getting closer to what he has to sell, the last few months have seen the tendency the other way. Under these circumstances it is difficult to see how a farmer is going to make enough profit to take care of his indebtedness or even to take care of the interest on his indebtedness.

Now, let us suppose, for an illustration, that a man owes $5,000, on which he is paying 9 per cent. Then let us assume that, by reason of legislative action, it is possible for that man to get money at 6 per cent. He saves then $150 a year. Of course, this is some saving, but, after all, how much will it really help him if his farming operations are still showing a loss? Every $150 that can be saved on the outgo, of course, lightens the burden just that much, but if money is still being lost, the eventual finish will be just the same whether the man is paying 9 per cent or 6 per cent. It will take a little longer to go broke. People can not borrow themselves into prosperity. We have got to look further for our remedy than more credit.

I refer here to the chart of the increase in mortgaged farms. I am not going to use these figures, as you probably think I am going to. I am not going to use them, as they are so frequently used by sensational speakers, to indicate the downhill course of agriculture. A mortgage does not necessarily mean that it has been entered into because of monetary losses. Mortgages may be used for raising money to make it possible to make more money; so, for the sake of argument, I am going to assume that this increase in mortgage indebtedness does not necessarily mean, taken by itself, that agriculture is going downhill.

But putting the best meaning possible on it, what conclusion do we reach? Let us take Minnesota, for instance, with its increase of 10 per cent in the number of farms mortgaged between 1910 and 1920. Now, this decade includes the period of the war and only includes a few months of the deflation period. It includes the period when it is popularly supposed agriculture reached its greatest height of prosperity. We find in the same decade North Dakota increased the number of mortgaged farms 25 per cent, with South Dakota making practically the same increase. These three States we might classify roughly as grain States. In the older States of Iowa, Illinois, and Wisconsin we do not find as great an increase in mortgages, but there was a much larger percentage mortgaged in 1890 in Iowa than in Minnesota, and even in 1920 we find that Iowa had a larger percentage of mortgaged farms than Minnesota. Illinois makes the best showing of the six States under consideration. Wisconsin shows a large percentage of increase in the prosperous decade of 1910-1920. Now, it does not make any difference whether these mortgages were made to raise money to pay losses or to build better buildings, till, buy more stock, or what not. The indebtedness is there just the same. It was created on a high-price level and must be paid on a lower-price level. If that price level remains say 25 per cent below the level that the debt was contracted on, it means that for every dollar borrowed, $1.25 will have to be paid back, this entirely aside from interest, so that, looking at the matter from this standpoint, credit, instead of helping, has been a detriment.

Let us turn for a moment to the matter of cooperative marketing. Just now cooperative marketing is being hailed as the great cure all for all our agricultural troubles; if we can only get all the farmers in the country organized to market all their products cooperatively, there would no longer be an agricultural problem. Now, what I am going to say may be construed by some of my friends as going back on some of my previous ideas—that I have always been a cooperater, that I have always been strong for cooperation. Well, now I want to say that I am just as strong for cooperative marketing to-day as I ever was, but I do not believe that cooperative marketing to-day is going to solve the matter of greater profits on the farm. Cooperative marketing developed to its fullest extent may cut out some of the spread between what the ultimate consumer pays and the farmer receives for his product; it may raise the price of what the farmer gets, at the same time lowering to a certain extent the price the consumer pays. That, at all events, is the ideal that the true cooperater has in mind. But cooperative marketing can not of itself be much of a price maker unless it can reach a point where the flow from the farm to the market can be regulated to meet demand. In that way something can be done in raising the price; but even that has its limitations. The citrus-fruit growers of California have probably the most successful cooperative enterprise we have in the United States, and have actually increased the price the growers receive through their methods of marketing, but in doing so they have opened the great danger that threatens cooperative marketing.

It is estimated by the citrus people themselves that the better profits they have secured for their members have caused a doubling of the fruit-producing area in California, which will begin to come into bearing in about five years. Now then, what is going to happen when this new acreage comes into bearing and when the additional acreage that will be put into trees during the next five years begins to come into bearing? Can the Citrus Fruit Growers' Association expand their market as rapidly as they expand their product? Another example is what has happened as a result of cooperative potato marketing:

The seven northern States, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Nebraska, produce 62 per cent of the potato crop grown in the United States.

In the last three or four years a number of these States have organized more or less efficient cooperative marketing associations, Michigan being a particular example of efficiency, and yet, in the last three years production in these seven States has increased 33 per cent and while there still are factors in the marketing end that can be improved all the States agree that the crop produced is larger than can be marketed profitably. Here are the figures:

ACREAGE—3 YEARS.

State.	1920	1921	1922
Michigan.....	345,000	340,000	357,000

Total (7 States).....	128,000,000	111,000,000	165,000,000

To just the extent that cooperative marketing increases the profit to the producer it will lead the producer to greater production, and in time to overproduction. Then, what can cooperative marketing do, if it has more to handle than there is demand for? Therefore, I do not think that cooperative marketing of itself can save the situation.

Then we are told by certain people that all that ails farming is high railroad rates, that if the railroad rates were reduced there would be no further difficulty. Well, I will admit that high railroad rates are a great handicap to farmers. They catch him coming and going. He has to pay the freight on what he sells, and he also has to pay the freight on what he buys. In a way, high freight rates are restricting and localizing his markets. Under the present freight rate structure the farmers in the Eastern States are enjoying the greatest prosperity they have had for a great many years, because they can compete for the markets in the large cities on the eastern coast. Notwithstanding the higher cost of production of farm products in the East, the freight rate structure acts pretty much as a tariff wall. But suppose we got our freight rates down to where they were prior to the war. What would it amount to to the individual farmer? I do not believe it would amount to $200 a year on the average. Now, are you so nearly prosperous that a $150-a-year saving on a $5,000 indebtedness and a $200-a-year saving on freight rates will make you prosperous? I do not think so. I do not believe that the line is as fine as that, or can be closed as easily.

Then there was the matter of tariff. It has been felt that if we had an adequate tariff on farm products it would go a long way toward solving our problems. Well, we have a high tariff on farm products, the highest tariff on farm products we have ever had in this country. Unfortunately, we also have the highest tariff on everything the farmer must buy that we have ever had in this country, so I am rather inclined to think that, as the tariff situation stands, the farmer really is not very much better off than he was before, except possibly as to wheat. I know it is argued that there is no protection to the American farmer as long as the United States and Canada are both exporters. As an economic proposition that is probably correct, that inasmuch as both the United States and Canada must compete in the world's market, the fact that Canadian wheat and flour can not come into this country does not make any particular difference. Now, I said as an "economic proposition," which I mean to qualify by saying that in this sense I use economic and theoretical in about the same way. There are a great many economic propositions that can be demonstrated theoretically to be correct, but in actual practice do not work out that way. I do not believe the competition of Canadian wheat can by any possibility be as great to the North Dakota farmer in Liverpool as it would be on the sample tables of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce; therefore I believe a tariff on wheat is necessary, and as I develop my theme I think I will convince you that a tariff on agricultural products is necessary to carrying out and applying the remedy for our situation that I have in mind.

For the last two years we have been told that the trouble with our farmers is due to the fact that our exports of foodstuffs have been too light, on account of the inability of Europe to buy. This has been repeated on platforms, in the daily press, and in the trade press until it has become ingrained in the thinking of the people. It is accepted as readily as the statement that two and two make four. As far as I know, outside of myself there has been no effort made whatever to put the facts before the people of the United States. There seems to be a propaganda at work that sees fit to ignore the facts, that sees fit to refuse to refer to them. I am not going to take time here and now to impute motives to the spreaders of this propaganda. It isn't as though the facts were inaccessible; it isn't as though they were mysteries; they have all been published; they have been collated by the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, and yet no reference is made to exact figures. The statement is simply made that farmers are going broke because Europe can not buy our food.

Now, let us have these figures sink in a little bit, because, in view of the way they have been persistently suppressed, they are of the utmost importance:

This refusal to recognize facts is one of the finest examples of controlled news I ever saw. Somebody has passed the word that people must be told that Europe is not buying our foodstuffs, and the well-trained chorus sings the song.

I have taken the five-year period prior to the war, the five years covered by the war, and the four-year period since the war. Now, these exports are by calendar years. The 1922 exports in all cases contain estimates for the December exports; but, even so, the figures will not be far enough out of the way to have any bearing on the argument.

Now, what do we find? We find that in the five pre-war years we exported in round numbers 503,000,000 bushels of wheat, 216,000,000 bushels of corn, and 40,000,000 bushels of rye. During the war, when it was not a question of price, when it was entirely a question of getting food, our wheat exports aggregated for these five years a little over a billion bushels. Our corn exports were about 200,000,000 bushels, and our rye exports were about 57,000,000 bushels. The great increase in wheat was due, of course, to the fact that the war was on, that Russia was out of the wheat-exporting business, and the people of Europe required food, and food was raised and sent them. Then we come to the four years since the war, and what do we find? Simply that in these four years, when Europe has been bankrupt, when Europe has been "unable to buy food," we have shipped them 1,134,288,284 bushels of wheat, 319,032,468 bushels of corn, and 158,504,377 bushels of rye.

Let us put it another way. In five years previous to the war the total exports of the three food grains—wheat, corn, and rye—amounted in round numbers to 771,000,000 bushels. During the war, when food was the paramount issue, when food had to be got at any cost, the United States' exports of these three grains was 1,348,000,000 bushels. Then we come to the four years that have followed the war—four years of a bankrupt, starving Europe, a Continent that can not buy food, a Continent that must be helped to buy food—and what do we find? Simply that in these four years we have shipped 1,611,000,000 bushels of these food grains, more than double in four years what we shipped in the five years prior to the war, and almost 300,000,000 bushels more in four years than we shipped in the five years of the war, when every muscle was being strained to produce food.

Now, in the light of these figures, do you blame me for saying that there is some ulterior motive back of this propaganda that American agriculture is depressed because Europe is not buying food?

Senator NORRIS has a bill now pending to form a corporation to finance the exporting of food to Europe. I have no criticism to make of Senator NORRIS. I believe he is one of the most valuable men that agriculture has in Congress to-day, but I believe that the Senator has been misled by taking the word of the propagandists as to our exports of food to Europe. I have no quarrel with Senator NORRIS's proposition if it will enable our farmers to ship more to Europe, but in the light of the figures I do not believe it will. Food is something that will be bought by the people of Europe irrespective of their financial condition, and I doubt very much whether financing exports will enable the individuals in Europe to buy any more than they require to sustain life; or, even if it would enable them to do so, I question very much whether they would do so under present conditions.

Now I have given you my reasons for thinking that all of the proposed recommendations will fall short of accomplishing their purpose, and that while they are all good and all necessary, no one of them will do the work, nor will all of them do the work unless this unseen thing in agriculture is brought into view and grappled with. Just what is this unseen thing I have been talking about and referring to? Well, in brief, it is this: About five years ago I began to compare the returns of agriculture as a whole with other lines of productive effort, and I found that agriculture lagged far behind manufacturing; therefore it seemed logical to suppose that there must be some law that manufacturers were observing that farmers were not. Arguing from that basis, I began to compare the methods of production of manufacturers and farmers. I found that a manufacturer is very careful to gauge his probable sales before contracting for his raw materials. The manufacturer—it doesn't make any difference what line it may be—sends out his traveling men to take orders for delivery from six months to one year in advance, and he bases his purchases of raw materials and the amount of goods that he expects to produce by the amount of sales booked by his traveling men.

The jobber who buys from the manufacturer sends his traveling men out to the retailers, and so does not place his orders with the manufacturer until he has a pretty good line on how much he is going to be able to sell the retailers. On the other hand, the retailer gauges his purchases from the jobber by the crop outlook and the population of his trading area. If he is in a manufacturing district, he takes into consideration the probability of continuous employment or the probability of strikes. He weighs carefully the question of whether labor is satisfied or not. If he is in a farming community, he keeps pretty close tab on crop conditions, so he places his orders accordingly.

Well, now, what does the farmer do? He puts in every acre that he can put in with himself and boys and as many hired men as he can get hold of, and he does it without any idea of how much is being produced in the world or what the demand for his products is going to be when he gets them ready for market. He simply hopes that they will be taken at a satisfactory price when he gets ready to sell them. We have a fundamental difference in procedure here, and we also have a fundamental difference in returns received, as this chart shows. Now, then, what is the answer? It is simply this: The manufacturer, the jobber, and the retailer have been conducting their business along sound economic principles, while farmers have not been doing so. The farmer has always felt that the size of the crop determined his prosperity. It is only within a few years that they have begun to realize that something besides size of crops determines their well-being. The farmers have not been alone in this. Nearly everyone has felt that whenever we had a big crop, irrespective of price, the country was all right; but 1922, with its good crop, has not brought the business revival that everyone expected would come, so it is beginning to dawn on business and financial interests that something besides the number of bushels determines the general condition of business in the United States.

This is the unseen thing that has been throttling agriculture, this working in defiance of sound economic law. Of course, the first thing that will come to the minds of a great many in this audience is that I am wrong when I talk about there being an overproduction of food, and will say that there can not be any overproduction of food as long as there is anybody starving in the world. Well, that is one of those statements that are true but while being true have very little weight in the question that we are now discussing. And yet there is a great deal of confusion in the minds of almost everybody on this subject. I want to see if I can get this distinction clear. If I can, it is going to be pretty easy to get what I want to say across. If I can't, I am not going to get anywhere at all. The question of there being people in the world who haven't enough to eat, who haven't sufficient clothing, or who haven't decent places in which to live is entirely distinct from the question of controlling agricultural production so as to make a profit for the farmer. The question of the distribution of opportunity, the distribution of work so that the physical well-being of every person in the world can be 100 per cent, is something that must be worked out and will be worked out as the years go by. But it can not be worked out by farmers and manufacturers producing goods that can not be purchased at a profit to them. We have two demands recognized by economists. One is known as the potential demand; that is, the demand that would exist if everybody could have all of every sort of production that they wanted. Then there is the effective demand, which means the demand that will take and pay a profitable price for the products. The effective demand is the only demand that the manufacturer considers; it is the only demand he can afford to consider, no matter how much he might desire to take into account the potential demand and attempt to fill it. Let me illustrate this point a little further. I think as a general proposition it is true that nearly every owner of a Ford, a Dodge, a Chevrolet, or any of the lower priced automobiles way down deep in their hearts have a desire for a Packard, a Pierce-Arrow, or even a Rolls-Royce. In other words, there is a potential demand in this country for these high-priced cars, just about equal to the number of the cheap cars now owned. But do you see the Rolls-Royce, the Packard, or Pierce-Arrow manufacturers bending their energies and adding to their plants for the purpose of making cars enough to supply this potential demand? Are they wasting any tears because several million people in this country are driving Fords who would like to have Packards? Not so anybody could notice it.

Every clothing manufacturer might produce clothing so that every man, woman, and child in the world could have two suits of clothes at a time; yet if there was no means of getting these clothes to these people he would simply have piled up a useless surplus and would go broke. The same thing applies exactly to the production of food, with a fundamental difference. There is a natural limitation to the consumption of food that does not apply to the consumption of goods. The consumption of goods is governed by the financial ability of the individual to purchase. It seems to be a law of human nature that as one's financial condition improves he buys more things; but it doesn't make any particular difference how rich a man may be he will only eat just about so much. He will eat what satisfies him, so the limit of food production is naturally reached some time before the limit of the production of goods.

Now, the farmers of the United States could undoubtedly produce double the amount of wheat and rye and corn that they are now producing. They could feed everyone who is now hungry; but if there was no means of getting that food to these people who are hungry, the farmers would be in exactly the same position as the manufacturer who ran his factory to take care of the potential rather than the effective demand. This may seem like a cold-blooded way of looking at this problem, but, in point of fact, it is not. If it were possible to feed these hungry people by producing irrespective of profit, then there might be some justification in asking farmers to make the sacrifice. But overproduction beyond the effective demand for farm products would simply break the farmers and not do the starving people of the world any good. There is a great deal of misunderstanding, I find, when I begin to talk this controlled-production idea. A great many farmers say, "Well, what good will higher prices do us when we have not anything to sell?" Controlled production simply means having something to sell at a profit. I have a letter on my desk from a farmer who says, "I am heavily in debt. The only chance I will ever have to pay my debts is to produce to the limit." Well, I might use this illustration: Suppose a shoe manufacturer was heavily in debt, and he was making shoes that cost him $2 a pair to make, but he could only sell those shoes for $1.50 a pair, and he would say to himself, "Now, here I am in the hole, and the only way I have of getting out of the hole is to produce all the shoes I can by working my factory 24 hours a day." I leave it to anybody here how far he would get in getting out of debt. How far is the farmer going to go toward getting out of debt if he produces 1,000 bushels of wheat that cost him $1.25 to produce and he only gets $1.10 a bushel for it? Is he going to get out of debt? Maybe he is, but I doubt it.

Now, I want to refer to the chart showing the curve of acreage and price of wheat from 1912 to 1922, inclusive. I want you to notice that price does not control production, but as the thing stands now, the farmer is getting the short end of it. He is about a season too late. Of course, in a way these are abnormal years. In 1914 the breaking out of the war caused a jump in price which induced a large acreage for the 1914-15 crop. In the fall of 1915, about the time the winter wheat people were putting in their 1916 acreage, there was a drop in the price of wheat and you will see a corresponding drop in the acreage for 1916. In the fall of 1916 there was a fairly good bulge in wheat, which was reflected to some extent in the increased acreage, and would probably have been increased more had not the season of 1917 in the spring-wheat district been rather backward. Then, of course, under the war stimulus, we shot our acreage up in 1919 to its highest point, because the armistice was not signed until after the winter-wheat seeding. There was a slight dip in price in the fall of 1919, and this dip in consideration of the war being over, caused a sharp break in the acreage for the 1920 crop, which, in view of developments in the fall of 1920, was exceedingly fortunate. The acreage of 1921 held about even with 1920, but the acreage for the crop year 1922 showed a considerable decrease, owing to the falling price during the year 1921.

Now, this shows that production is controlled by the rise and fall of prices. This chart shows substantially the same curves on many of the grain crops, therefore a great many economists say that the present situation, if left alone, will eventually adjust itself, that production will naturally continue to decline until there will be a scarcity, which will cause prices to go up again, and they will continue to go up until production increases to a point that begins to build up a surplus. Of course this is true, but it is a hard road to travel. It is a road that is strewn with the wrecks of farm homes, of blasted hopes, suicide, and premature old age. But this natural control of production gives us the cue that, if we will but follow it, will lead to the control of production intentionally, which will hold prices at a more stable level, preventing these great swings from year to year, with their consequent losses and profits to the farmer.

There is a bill before Congress, known as the Christopherson bill, for the stabilization of nonperishable farm-products prices, the idea being to have the Government agree at the beginning of a crop year to purchase any surplus at a guaranteed price and sell this surplus on the world's market for what they will bring. The prices for the following year are to be determined by the amount of surplus that had to be disposed of the previous year, so if a surplus was produced one year the guaranteed price would be made so low as to make it unattractive for the growers to put in that particular crop the following year. That is the theory of the Christopherson bill. It recognizes the necessity of coupling stabilization up with some sort of controlled production. Unless this is done in some way, any guaranteed-price plan would eventually fall of its own weight. If there was no limit to the production in any way, there would be so much produced that the taxpayers of the country would rise in revolt against carrying out the promise to purchase. The United States Government would then be in exactly the same position as the Governments of Europe are now in with their printing-press money. They would simply be swamped with farm products, so that if farmers expect any help from the Government in the way of price fixing or price stabilization, they must make up their minds to do something themselves.

We hear a good deal yet about the danger of the United States becoming an importer of foodstuffs. I believe that this is absolutely impossible, because long before the United States would get to a point where it would begin to import foodstuffs prices would reach a point where it would be profitable to grow them. But I believe the greatest profit to agriculture, and incidentally to the entire United States, lies in producing just as closely as possible enough for our home consumption, letting Canada, the Argentine, Australia, India, and Russia, with their cheap lands, feed the world. I believe that it is about time for the American farmer to realize that he has gone broke trying to feed the world. We must remember that, while it may take several years, eventually Russia is going to come back as an exporting country of foodstuffs. We must not overlook Canada. One of the recent ministers of agriculture of Canada made the statement that Canada has 252,000,000 acres of potential wheat land. Personally I think this minister was a little bit overoptimistic. When you consider that 252,000,000 acres of wheat land is practically the entire wheat acreage of the world at this time, it is hardly probable that Canada will ever have as much land as that under wheat, for the simple reason that if they ever did it would be so cheap they would all go broke.

But to get down to the realm of reasonable probability, I believe the time is comparatively near—by comparatively I mean within, say, a quarter of a century—that Canada will be producing as much wheat as the United States. That will mean that they will be just that much stronger competitors of ours in the markets of the world. Of course, if that time ever comes, the United States will be forced out of the wheat-producing game for export. Now, would it not be a great deal better to get out of the exporting business and make a profit on every crop of wheat for the next 25 years than it would be to buck the growing Canadian surpluses and lose money on every crop of wheat? It seems to me that here is a plain business proposition.

Referring again to the figures I gave in the matter of exports, I would like to ask what do you think is going to happen to the American farmers when the time comes, as it will, when our exports of the three leading food grains drop to the basis of 1909-1913? We surely will eventually get back to that basis of exports. Russia is not going to be out of agricultural production forever, although I am willing to grant it will probably be from 5 to 10 years before Russia can become much of a factor in the world's export of foodstuffs, but without Russia there is no question but what Canada is going to progressively increase her output. There is little doubt but what we will see an increase from Argentina and probably from Australia. There is no way possible to prevent the time coming when our aggregate exports of the three leading food grains will be back to a basis of around 700,000,000 bushels for a five-year period. We certainly are not going to continue to produce on the basis of an export of 1,811,000,000 bushels for four years. If, as the propagandists I referred to claim, the trouble with American agriculture is that we are not sending food to Europe, in the light of our exports in the last four years, what is going to happen to us when we really drop to a 700,000,000 or 800,000,000 bushels aggregate for five years? Following out the natural economic law, as our exports decline, if we continue to produce on the same basis we are now producing, prices will also decline, and the decline in these prices will cause an eventual falling off in production to meet the demand.

I want to emphasize again that production does adapt itself to demand, so in advocating intentional adaptation of production to demand, I am simply advocating a course that is absolutely in accordance with economic law, with this difference—controlled or adapted production means this: It means more intensive farming of fewer acres, which will cut down the overhead cost and naturally the cost of production. There is a vast difference between a short crop caused by climatic conditions when the yield of wheat, for instance, may not average more than 9 bushels to the acre, and the production of an equal amount of this short crop with an acre yield of 14 bushels to the acre. Farmers have often said when I have been talking to them on the controlled production idea: "Well, what good would it do us when we have a higher price if we haven't anything to sell?" Of course, if a man can't see the difference between controlled production and having nothing to sell, that chap is about hopeless and there isn't very much use trying to waste any more time or words on him. A surprisingly large number of farmers seem to think that what is meant by controlled or adapted production is no production at all. I don't know where they get that idea, except that they choose to believe the opponents of the idea rather than the statements of the advocates of the idea. It certainly shouldn't take very much eloquence to prove to a man that he would be better off with, say 750 bushels of $1.50 wheat raised on 60 acres than he would be with 1,200 bushels of 75-cent wheat raised on 120 acres, particularly as the 750 bushels would have cost him less money to produce than the 1,200 bushels.

I also think that farmers have been paying too much attention to commercial production and not enough attention to production for living. By that I mean that there is too much of foodstuffs bought from the grocery store that might just as well be produced on the farm in a great many cases. I believe a farm family would be much better off if instead of growing 100 per cent of their stuff for sale they grew, let us say, 90 per cent for sale and 10 per cent for their own use. Farmers would then be doing two things. By this method of procedure they would be cutting down the amount available to sell and they would also be cutting down the outgo for the family food. Of course, it might be argued in this that by proceeding along this line they would be cutting down the market for the producers of the food they were raising themselves.

While this might be true to a certain extent, it would probably bring up the amount of food produced for market by causing the people who were producing what the farm was now buying to go into other lines, so that the actual decrease of production of products for sale would not amount to the whole 10 per cent. But even so, it would improve the economic condition of the farmer.

Now, I am coming to a very important consideration: in fact, I am coming to the biggest rock, the biggest obstacle, that we will have to remove if it is ever possible to put the idea of controlled or adapted production across. Will the farmers themselves realize the necessity of working together? Unless some outside pressure can be brought to bear, I am frank to confess that I believe the chances of getting farmers to work together with sufficient unanimity to put a program of controlled production over are rather remote. But, on the other hand, unless farmers are willing to get together and are willing, as I will show a little later on, to join in a plan sponsored by the Government to control production, then I say that farmers might just as well quit running to legislatures and to Congress for relief. They might just as well quit asking their farm papers to help them. It all comes down to a question of whether or not the farmers are going to get together and help themselves put over the only thing that will give agriculture the same standing and the same profits of other productive enterprises. We are getting pretty close to the parting of the ways in this country. We are getting almost to a point where we have got to make a great decision. When I say "we" I mean the farmers. Farmers have got to decide pretty soon whether or not farming is going to grow into a business where the returns will be somewhere near the returns received in other lines of productive industry, or they have got to take the other road, where farming will be merely a question of shelter, food, and a few clothes, where it will be merely a board and keep proposition, where it will be practically on the same level as existed in Europe prior to the war and probably will exist in Europe for many years to come. Are we to have business men or peasants on American farms?

The decision rests entirely with the farmers. They have got to work out their own salvation on this to a great extent. In order to do it they have got to give up some of that individuality and individualism which is such a marked characteristic of the American farmer.

For good or ill, we will not discuss which, organized labor has become a great power in this country, and it became a great power because every member of a labor union is loyal to every other member of that union. The solidarity of union labor is what has given it its power. If union labor had never grown beyond the mere loose organization that we now have even in the best of our farmer organizations, it would not have got anywhere.

Now, then, the great question is to take our material as we find it and try and determine whether or not the material we have on hand can be made into such a structure as we desire. Five years ago, when I first began to talk controlled or adapted production, I did not have any concrete idea of how it was going to be done. I saw the obstacles; I saw the difficulty of getting farmers to work together, but I put up the general proposition that controlled production must come. Then last year, after the agricultural conference at Washington, Mr. Roger Babson, the statistician, made the statement that he regretted no one told the conference at Washington just what was the matter with agriculture. He said there were about 10 per cent too many farmers. He said 10 per cent of the farmers of to-day should be plasterers, carpenters, masons, or what not. In a speech at St. Paul last December, Mr. Babson raised his percentage and said there were 25 per cent too many farmers. Now that is simply putting in another way the statement that we are producing more agricultural products than can be handled profitably, and 25 per cent of our farmers should be off the farm and in some other business where they would be consumers. Babson suggests they ought to be carpenters, bricklayers, plumbers, plasterers, and so forth. That is very fine, if it were possible to make a bricklayer, carpenter, or plumber of a farmer overnight if all he had to do was to get the tools. But unfortunately a farmer in any one of these crafts would not be any better and would not be any more skillful than would a carpenter, bricklayer, or plumber if he were dropped on a farm and told to farm it.

If it is a fact, and I do not dispute the general conclusion, that under the present methods of hit-and-miss, haphazard production we have 25 per cent too many farmers, it means that eventually 1 farmer out of every 4 has got to quit. But, when he does quit, he won't be a bricklayer, carpenter, plumber, or any kind of a skilled laborer, because the fourth that quit will, in the following out of the inexorable economic law, be the least efficient and the only thing that he can put his hand to will be unskilled labor, the lowest-paid labor we have. He would become a competitor in the labor market. He would tend to reduce wages, the reduction of wages would naturally be reflected in lower prices for farm products, and lower prices for farm products would be reflected in a lessening demand for goods—so we have a vicious circle established here that must be broken in some way. I believe the way to do it is to make it profitable for all the farmers we now have on the land to stay on the land and become a market for the products of the skilled laborers in industry. Of course the consumers of food are against any idea of controlling production, because they feel it will raise prices. I am willing to admit it will raise prices; that is the intention, but I believe that the lesson of the last two years has been pretty well learned. I believe the laboring man realizes as never before that cheap food is not to his interest.

Now, this brings us back to the proposition of the consumption of food and the consumption of manufactured goods, because there is no question that, measured by our ability to produce manufactured goods, there is an overproduction that is now measured by the potential demand I referred to in the opening. As I see it, we must first of all get the farmers of the country in such shape that a large part of this potential demand now existing on the farms must be made an effective demand for manufactured goods; make it much nearer the potential demand—that is, we must have such farm prices and profits that will enable the great mass of farmers in this country to buy more goods. In that way the spread between the potential demand for food and effective demand for food will be narrowed through the full employment and higher wages of the laborers in the cities. Then production can be increased just to the extent that the effective demand increases. Everyone admits that the prosperity of the farmers is the groundwork of the prosperity for everybody else, so I feel that a plan of adapted or controlled production, worked out scientifically, will go further in bringing about that ideal that we want for our country—when there will be no poverty, no one short of food, no one short of clothes—than any other plan that has ever been thought of. But we still come back to the old question: How are we going to do it?

Congressman YOUNG of North Dakota has this suggestion: He says let the Government sponsor an organization of farmers who will come into this organization under an agreement to obey orders as to the amount of acreage they will put in of any given crop. Then let the Government agree to buy the crop at a certain specified price that will yield a profit to the producers. The people who do not see fit to come into this organization, who want to go their own way, let them go their own way, but the Government will be under no obligation whatever and will not buy anything that the nonmembers of that organization have for sale. Congressman YOUNG will do two things with this plan, two very essential things. He will fix a price that will be profitable and at the same time will prevent the production of an unwieldy surplus. Of course, this idea isn't worked out in full detail. It can't be until some ideas can be had of how the farmers will regard it; whether or not they will be willing to take it up. In view of the fact that our winter-wheat acreage just put in is the third largest on record, a great many people are saying that farmers are being misrepresented by those who are trying to help them. They are saying that farmers must have been satisfied with last year's price of wheat, else they would not have put in such an enormous acreage of winter wheat. Now, this is a hard argument to meet. It is rather difficult to tell anyone who brings up this argument that farmers are a lot of dubs and are perfectly willing to keep on producing at a loss. Well, we have either got to tell them that, or else admit that all the figures and claims we have been making that farm prices are less than cost of production aren't so. Really, it puts us in a very embarrassing position, and if the spring-wheat farmers next spring go to work and put in as large an acreage of wheat as they did last year, I don't see where I am going to have a leg to stand on when I am told that the farmers must be perfectly satisfied with prices as they are.

When I was presenting the idea of controlled production through an organization of this sort before the House Agricultural Committee last month, I was asked if I thought the American farmers would go into a plan of this kind. Well, the only answer I could make was that I didn't know, but that I did have enough confidence in the common sense of the American farmer to think he would go in if he could be persuaded that he could make money by doing so.

Now, gentlemen, we have come up to this point. I don't know whether you agree with all I have said here or not, but if you do I don't want you to go away from this convention and say: "Yes, that is a good thing; that ought to be done." What I want to know is whether you are going to do it or not. I want to know whether you are merely going to sit around and say: "Yes, that is a good thing and should be done," or whether you are going to do it. I want to know whether you are for or against such an organization as your Congressman YOUNG proposes. I don't know of a better place for a show of hands on this proposition than right up here in the great bread basket of the Northwest; and I would like to see before this meeting adjourns some evidence that the farmers of this part of the country, at least, are willing to go ahead on a controlled-production program that will lead them out of their present situation into one where they can pay off their debts and make a profit.

We want cooperative marketing. We need it under this plan of controlled production. We need lower freight rates. We need lower taxes. We need a tariff on agricultural products. We need stabilized prices. All these things will be required even under a program of adapted production, because they will all save money; but I want to tell you right now that if you get your farming on a profitable basis ability to borrow money and the interest rates won't be much of a factor. You will have people coming around trying to loan you money at practically your own rates. If you are making money, the freight rates won't be so oppressive, the taxes won't be so oppressive, but the cornerstone of the whole structure has got to be profits, and that cornerstone has got to be high, broad, and firmly laid or else the whole structure of American agriculture is going to fall. The very cornerstone of profitable agriculture is controlled production; and if this generation doesn't see it, if we go on to a point where we get a peasantry on the land, we can't have that American standard of living that we hear so much about in the cities. A peasantry on the land will mean a condition and a plane of living in this country just about equivalent to that in the pre-war days in Europe. Better farming to the end that we get more to the acre, fewer acres under cultivation, to prevent getting a burdensome surplus, is the way out of our whole difficulty.

Now, I may have been talking to no purpose here. I may not have convinced you; but, whether I have or not, I feel that sometimes the logic of events will convince you that I am right. Sometime you will have to come to what I am now advocating, but I want to see it done now.

Following my remarks in the House and before the House Committee on Agriculture in favor of a controlled production, editorials appeared in a number of newspapers. Here are two from Farm, Stock, and Home:

STABILIZATION AND PRODUCTION.

At the recent hearings on price stabilization, before the Senate and House Agricultural Committees, the writer took the position that any governmental price-fixing, or price stabilization of farm products policy, unless joined with a plan to keep down production to the limit of demand, would result in failure, because of the inevitable increase in production that guaranteeing a high price would bring about. Rich as the United States is, it could not carry out its promises, because of the protests of taxpayers. There would be the same economic waste in overproduction, even though the producer got a higher price, that there is with an overproduction and low prices, the only difference being the loss would not fall so directly on the producer in the former case as it does in the latter.

Congressman YOUNG, of North Dakota, has suggested a plan to control production. He hasn't it worked out in detail, so its final form may be very different from the first draft. In brief, he proposes to have the Government say to the farmers that if they will come into an organization to be formed and supervised by the Government, and agree to reduce their acreage on the various grain crops whatever per cent ordered, the Government will buy at a guaranteed price the crops of those who join the organization and live up to its terms. Those who preferred to keep out and go their way, putting in as much of the various grains as they pleased, could not sell their crops to the Government, but would have to take their chances on the world market just as the Government would have to do on whatever surplus grains there might be.

This is simply applying the tariff principle to agriculture. It is considered perfectly legitimate for American manufacturers to get as much as they can for all they sell at home and dispose of their surplus to foreign buyers for what they can get. We think Congressman YOUNG has supplied the missing link in the Johnson-Peek plan, which is the same as outlined in the foregoing, lacking the vital matter of controlled production. It is also an improvement on the Lyon plan, which contemplates the purchase of the surplus at a price set before seeding. An adjustment the following year is to be made in the price to discourage the production of the crop having the burdensome surplus.

This is the groundwork of the Christopherson bill. In actual practice, we believe the first year under this plan would produce so much of everything that next year's prices would have to be far too low, and the loss sustained by the Government would be very high on the first crop. With Congressman YOUNG's plan, the reduction of the surplus would start at seeding time of the first harvest to be handled under a price-fixing plan, so that the surplus, if any, would be small, and the loss to the Government would not be great.

Take the United States out of the exporting column and the world price for wheat would rise to very nearly the price the Government might guarantee. If Canada could be induced to adopt a similar system, the world price would go to the guaranteed price in the United States and Canada, for there is no question that North America holds the key to the wheat price if her peoples will but realize it. We will discuss other phases of Congressman YOUNG's plan in future issues.

It may be, as suggested by a member of the House Agricultural Committee, that farmers would not take kindly to the plan because of its hampering the exercise of their own judgment as to how much of a certain crop they will grow. Our answer was that we had enough confidence in the ability of the majority of American farmers to realize the possibility of greater profits to bring them into such a working agreement. We will hold to that view until farmers themselves prove they prefer to continue in the old rut of hard labor and scant return.

[From Farm, Stock, and Home, Minneapolis, Minn., January 15.]

WILL YOU HELP YOURSELVES?

It is now generally admitted that growing more than can be sold at a profitable price is the fundamental cause of agricultural depression. Nevertheless we hear farmers say, "What good will high prices do us if we haven't anything to sell?" Do you know, folks, when that is sprung on us by presumably intelligent men we feel like throwing up our hands and saying it's no use.

Controlled production does not mean growing nothing at all; yet an appalling large number of people seem to have that idea. Controlled production does not mean deliberately bringing about famine, as President Harding and others seem to think. It simply means trying to match supply to demand by having every farmer reduce his acreage of crops a certain per cent.

The big question is how to do it. As stated in last issue, we believe Congressman YOUNG has the idea. Let the Government sponsor an organization of farmers who will pledge themselves to obey orders and reduce their acreage as requested. Then let the Government agree to pay a fixed minimum price for the crops, this price to be high enough to insure a fair profit.

Now, the question is, Will the farmers come into such a scheme if organized? We do not know, but we are going to test the matter out right now as far as this part of the country is concerned by making it easy for every reader of Farm, Stock, and Home to say whether or not they would go into such a deal with Uncle Sam. Fill out coupon in signboard. If you will, say so; if you won't, say so. The point is we want a showdown in this, and want it quickly.

The Courier-News, Fargo, said:

GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

The railroads of the country are under Government control. Their rates are fixed by the Government and the amount of profit they may make is supposed to be regulated, although this feature is not yet perfected. The railroads accept this as the lesser of two evils. The other evil, which they fear more than control, is Government ownership.

Yet the evil came upon them through their own sinning. The day of rebates, of making the public pay "all the traffic would bear," and of outrageous wrong and discrimination, brought upon the railroads the natural fruits, and rigid control by the Government was that fruit. Bitter as it is, the railroads, while they make wry faces over it, accept it rather than the final result which impends—Government ownership.

But railroads are not alone in Government control. Our street-car lines, our public-service companies, supplying gas, light, and heat, our public warehouses, all are under the hand of some government—State, county, or city—that their rapacity and natural greed may be curbed and the public protected.

If Government control is necessary in these instances, and there are few who will deny it, why should not Government control be extended to cover the farmer and agriculture?

That seems to be the gist of the question asked by Congressman GEORGE M. YOUNG, who surprises the Courier-News with the advanced position he takes and the lengths to which he is willing to go to redeem agriculture.

You will read Mr. YOUNG's statement elsewhere in this issue. It was prepared for publication in a farm weekly, but as it talks mighty plain doctrine to the farmer, it has its place in our columns.

What, in brief, Congressman YOUNG proposes is that the Government take over the marketing of farm products. He wants to see a corporation which he would call a Federal Marketing Corporation, which will have for its duties the handling of the matter of farm production much as the manufacturer now handles and controls his product!

In other words, the Government would control farming as it does the railroads. It would not own the farm lands or the machinery of production, any more than it owns the rails or coaches or engines of the railroads. But it would put a period to overproduction and would set the rate at which the various farm products might be sold. It would serve as a governing body, eliminating waste and overproduction and assuring the man who went into farming a just return for his labor and on his investment.

We can hear some people remark: "That's socialism, thinly disguised," and expect the consequent denunciation. Others will smile and say: "That is nonpartisan doctrine, lacking only the label."

To both the answer of Congressman YOUNG is commended. It is either that, or "we shall have, as they have in Europe, classes of society well defined, say, the peasant class, the middle class, the upper class. What an end for America!"

It is well worth while to consider what George N. Peek, a hard-headed business man says upon the subject of a controlled production. Mr. Peek is president of the Moline Plow Co. In an address before the Ohio Implement Dealers' Association, he said:

The implement industry is at its lowest ebb. Why?

First. The buying power of its customer, the farmer, is paralyzed. Second. It was organized to give American farms their original equipment during our development period. That day is done. We shall now have a replacement business only. We have an excess of manufacturing and sales capacity. The fittest will survive. This elimination contest is here, intensified many times by the desperate condition of agriculture. What must you and I do to survive and flourish? Know the situation and chart our course by knowledge.

Let us look to our customer. The weighted net average of wholesale prices is called the general price index. The net average of terminal prices for farm products is called the farm price index. The former is a measure of the price the farmer pays for what he buys; the latter, of what he gets for what he sells. Comparison of the two shows the exchange value of his product. That comparison is shocking. It shows exchange value about 65 per cent of pre-war. But even this is above the mark, because:

(a) Retail prices have gone up more than wholesale, and the farmer pays retail prices.

(b) The farmer does not get terminal prices. He pays an enormously increased freight both ways.

(c) The figures do not adequately reflect increases in rent, interest, and taxes since the war.

Considering these other elements it is probably safe to say that the farmer's buying power has been cut squarely in two.

This is a desperate situation. There are two ways to cure it—

(1) Raise the price of what the farmer sells.

(2) Lower the price of what he buys.

Can we raise the price of what he sells?

Never forget this. American price of every crop we export is not fixed here by American conditions. It is fixed by world conditions. Why? We must sell our surplus abroad in world competition, at a price fixed by world supply and demand and regulated by world conditions. Since it is economic law that the price of the surplus is the price of the crop, world price fixes domestic price. A tariff of $10 per bushel on wheat would not make one cent's difference. Chicago price is now, and always has been, Liverpool price less cost of transportation.

The farmer buys in a tariff-protected market regulated by American conditions; he sells in a free-trade market regulated by world conditions. For this reason you can raise the price of what he sells in only two ways:

1. Fix world conditions.

2. Find a way to let the farmer's home price be regulated as are industrial domestic prices—by American conditions in a protected market.

I am not here to talk of fixing the world. Let Lloyd-George do it. But I know we must fix the American farmer. All we could do to lower the price of what he buys would not restore his buying power. His buying power is, say, 40 per cent of total buying power. Ninety-two per cent of our commerce is domestic. When he is 50 per cent out of the market nearly one-fifth of our domestic commerce is gone. This is enough to destroy our economic structure. Therefore you, I, everybody in America have one prime job, and that is to give the farmer an American price for his product. It is not an insurmountable problem. Industry solved it long ago. How?

Industry regulates production and supply to demand. If it produces a surplus that would depress price below cost, it either holds and checks production or dumps it abroad at less than the American price, and by equalizing supply with demand at home maintains price at cost plus a profit. It can dump abroad because the tariff protects it, and because it is organized and financed to do so, but above all, because it controls its own marketing mechanism.

If agriculture suggests regulating production a hypocritical howl goes up from every blind leader of the blind in America. If the manager of a great industry did not regulate production he would be sent to an insane asylum.

The steps necessary to restore agriculture to an American price are:

(1) Organize and finance it to a point where unified sales policy is possible, where it can hold or sell surplus abroad at world price, regulating supply to demand at cost plus profit on the domestic market.

(2) Protect it by tariff.

(3) Give it control of its own marketing mechanism.

Exactly this has been done with industry. Therefore it can be done for agriculture. Until it is done, and as long as we have a depressed world fixing farm price and a high tariff and highly organized industry fixing all others (which may be forever), there will be a spread so wide between the price the farmer pays and the price he gets that farm buying power will be dead and domestic commerce disarranged and paralyzed. For industry and commerce to permit this would be slow suicide for them and for the Nation, politically as well as economically; therefore, they will not permit it when they understand. The only question is one of the time and effort necessary to impregnate the opinion of 110,000,000 people with an economic truth.

Such is the outlook on restoring the farmer's dollar by raising the price he gets. Before considering the other method—lowering price he pays—let me warn you that while you can help in the latter way you can not cure. You can only cure by permitting him to sell, not in a free-trade market regulated by world conditions but, like every other American citizen, in an American market regulated by American conditions.

NESTOR MONTOKA, JR.—FRANCES MONTOKA.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I call up House Resolution 494.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 494.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Nestor Montoka, jr., the sum of $186.66 and to Frances Montoka $120, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. Nestor Montoka at the time of his death, January 13, 1923.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual and customary resolution following the decease of a Member. I do not think that I ought to take up the time of the House to say anything more than that it has had the consideration of the Committee on Accounts and was unanimously recommended for adoption.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. A. P. NELSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SUBSTITUTE TELEPHONE OPERATOR.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 493.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the employment of a substitute telephone operator, compensation at the rate of $2.50 per diem, from February 1 to March 3, 1923, inclusive.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is necessary to provide for a telephone substitute operator to take care of the business, and comes recommended by the Clerk of the House, Mr. Page. It will involve an expenditure of only $77.50. Mr. Page wrote to the chairman of the Committee on Accounts as follows in respect to this matter:

JANUARY 19, 1923.

Hon. CLIFFORD IRELAND,
Chairman Committee on Accounts,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. IRELAND: Inclosed is a draft of a resolution for the employment of a substitute telephone operator from February 1 to March 3, 1923, inclusive.

This will involve an expenditure of $77.50, made necessary by reason of the exhaustion of the appropriation for a substitute telephone operator for the current fiscal year through sickness and the continuous operation of our exchange. For the same purpose from March 3 until the end of the fiscal year I shall submit a deficiency estimate to the Committee on Appropriations.

Very truly yours,

WM. TYLER PAGE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the necessity for a substitute telephone operator during the month of February to March 4?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. As the gentleman knows, there has been considerable sickness. The regular operators have been unable to perform their duties. We have had to have substitute telephone operators in order to take care of the business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, it is to provide a substitute for some one who is sick?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise, if I may be permitted to do so, to inquire about the plan for business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to-morrow the program is to consider claims unobjected to on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And if any of the pension bills, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] desires to call up to-day, are not concluded to-day, will they also be continued to-morrow? In other words, will to-morrow be a Private Calendar day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I understand it is the purpose of the gentleman from Wyoming to ask that the business in order to-day shall be in order to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. And I make that request now, and ask that at the conclusion of business before the House we may take up the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the pension bills, bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to may be taken up to-day and to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So that there will be no misunderstanding about it, I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] has but one bill, and that the gentleman from Minnesota has another bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have two omnibus bills.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I understand that the request is that at the conclusion of the pension bills we take up private bills unobjected to, and that the business in order to-day be in order to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That is it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to state in the request that the Private Calendar would not be taken up until to-morrow because there are a number of gentlemen who are interested in that Calendar who would probably have to remain all the afternoon here waiting the conclusion of the pension bills?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, gentlemen surely can remain here for an hour; it will not take longer than that.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMPLIFIERS IN THE HOUSE CHAMBER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has a resolution which he desires to call up that I did not have in mind at the time I made the request a moment ago. I ask unanimous consent to modify the order just made so that this resolution from the Committee on Rules may be presented, following the consideration of the pension bills.

Mr. GARNER. Let us have the resolution reported; let us know what it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], providing for final disposition of the amplifiers here in the House, as to whether they shall be retained, or what disposition shall be made of them. The resolution provides that the Committee on Rules shall make an investigation of the matter and report their conclusions to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to modifying the order just made, so that the resolution referred to may be considered at the conclusion of the pension bills? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

BUSINESS IN ORDER ON MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Monday next is a maverick Monday. I ask unanimous consent that District of Columbia business shall be in order on Monday next, January 29, 1923.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that business of the District of Columbia be in order on Monday next? Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. That will not interfere with the regular District day that follows?

Mr. MONDELL. No; that will be an additional day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 13980, an omnibus pension bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up an omnibus pension bill and asks unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KNUTSON: On page 9, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the House that John W. Harris has died since this item was allowed.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Later,

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the committee what policy has been followed by the committee in the award of these various pensions to these different individuals. What are the ranges of rate that the committee decided upon for various disabilities?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the policy of the committee, so far as it can possibly follow, is to allow applications for pensions that have been rejected by the Pension Bureau on some technicality. We waive technicalities. These two small omnibus bills represent a number of bills which have been allowed since last May, I think,

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman does not exceed in any instance the rate for pay under the general law?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, yes; where it is proved that the applicant is bedridden and in bad circumstances physically. I have in mind a case where the applicant was receiving $30 per month at the Pension Bureau and he was absolutely helpless, and I think we allowed him $72. The injuries were the result of his service, but there are few instances, and they are very exceptional, where a greater amount is allowed than under the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will these two omnibus bills complete the work, so far as omnibus bills are concerned, of this session?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I think we will probably have 40 or 50 bills reported out some time next month.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means there are 40 or more claims that will have to be considered in an omnibus bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; and that will clean up the work of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is fair to state in connection with what was stated by the gentleman in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that where you granted $72 to this Spanish war veteran you did not exceed the general law now in force for soldiers of the Civil War who are suffering total disabilities.

Mr. KNUTSON. No; we try to put all on the same basis and do exact justice to all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 13540, and ask that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, strike out all of lines 24 and 25; and on page 10, lines 1 and 2.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Well—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Wardlow has died since the bill was reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CARL OLSEN.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 13397, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 13397, and asks that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13397) repealing so much of an act approved September 22, 1922, granting pension to certain soldiers and sailors and their widows, as grants a pension of $24 per month to Carl Olsen, late of the United States Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and widows of such soldiers and sailors," approved September 22, 1922, as authorized and directed the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll the name of Carl Olsen, late of the United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month, this being in addition to the Navy pension he is now receiving under section 4756, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say for the information of the House that through an error on the part of the Pension Bureau in sending the wrong papers to the committee, this man, Carl Olsen, was placed on the pension rolls where it should have been Carl "Olson." They are two different individuals, and the committee intended to place Carl "Olson" on the pension roll. This is to correct that mistake.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. What provision was made to provide for the Swede "Olson" rather than the Norwegian "Olsen"?

Mr. KNUTSON. That will have to be taken up later, I will say to the gentleman. There is no provision made.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am surprised that the gentleman would display so much ignorance. The one is a Swede and the other is a Norwegian.

Mr. KNUTSON. It may be Danish. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I accept the word of the gentleman, who is an authority on Scandinavian matters. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VOICE-AMPLIFYING SYSTEM.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman going to offer that now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will do it now if it is thought best. I call up House Resolution 470, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up House Resolution 470, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 470.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules is hereby authorized and directed to make full inquiry into the matter of the permanent installation in the House wing of the Capitol Building and in the Hall of the House of Representatives of the apparatus or device, now experimentally in operation therein, designated as a "Public address or voice amplifying system." The committee may sit during the sessions of the House and shall report to the House at the earliest practicable date its recommendations as to the desirability and advisability of such system for use in the House of Representatives, together with detailed information covering the cost of installation, operation, and maintenance. The Architect of the Capitol Building and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall assist said committee in the discharge of its duties hereunder.

With the following committee amendment:

On line 1, after the word "Rules," insert "or a subcommittee thereof."

On line 7, after the word "committee," strike out the words "may sit during the sessions of the House."

On line 12, after the word "maintenance," strike out "The Architect of the Capitol Building and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall assist said committee in the discharge of its duties hereunder."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I believe the next thing in order is to take up unobjected bills on the Private Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

O. H. TITTMANN.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6245) for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that no gentleman would object to the consideration of this bill.

The bill is for the relief of a man who has given probably the longest continuous and at all times distinguished service to the United States of almost any man who has served in that position. He never had anything but a very meager compensation for his services. The nature of his work kept him from engaging in any kind of business that would enable him to accumulate any of this world's goods. He is now a very old man, practically an invalid, and at longest has but a few months or years to live; and this bill is for the purpose of enabling him to finish up his days with just some of the comforts and the necessities of life.

We have passed a large number of pension bills here this afternoon that in principle are on all fours with what is being sought to be done for this man.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Is there any difference in principle between this sort of legislation and such legislation as we have enacted for the benefit of retired Army officers and naval officers, and Mr. Justice Moody, and Mr. Justice Pitney, and the civil-service employees of the Government generally?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is in principle exactly the same.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course it may be said that the remuneration contemplated here, which I think is $150 a month, is very much less than prevailed in most lines of endeavor at all comparable with the service that Doctor Tittmann rendered to his country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true. Doctor Tittmann has been a specialist in his line of work. I have not the report, and I will be glad if the gentleman from Massachusetts would go in some detail into the facts, or if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hawes] will give in more detail the service that Doctor Tittmann has rendered.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report this bill. They gave it very careful consideration. Their report is unanimous. We discovered that this bill had passed the Senate; that it was favorably reported upon by Mr. Alexander, of the former administration, and by Mr. Hoover, of this administration. It refers to a man of great age who possibly can not survive another year. For 48 years he was a faithful servant of the Government. He was at one time head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and acted as commissioner in the boundary dispute between the United States and Canada, for which he received no compensation. He is a man whose advice has been sought by scientific men watching the development of this country for years. We found no objection to this claim from any source. All of Doctor Tittmann's contemporaries are either dead or drawing pensions. This is a simple act of justice to a faithful servant of the American people who represented them for nearly half a century.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not a fact that in addition to his extreme age this gentleman is now afflicted with some physical infirmity?

Mr. HAWES. He is bedridden at the present time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And utterly unable to do anything to make a living?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If this man had retained his health and had continued in the service, how long would it have been under the present law until he would have gone on the pension roll?

Mr. HAWES. Approximately four years only.

Mr. RANKIN. What would that pension have amounted to, or how would it have compared with the amount provided in this bill?

Mr. HAWES. I am advised that it would have been a considerably larger amount than is provided by this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. And would have lasted for the remainder of his life, would it?

Mr. HAWES. It would.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this case is a very meritorious one. This man gave practically half a century of his time to the great work of the Government. To-day he is without funds, ill, decrepit, and yet, proud of the fact that he is an American citizen, he will not accept charity. In view of the service that he has rendered, attested to by everyone who has come in contact with him and who knows the facts, I feel that he is worthy of the consideration of this House, and I sincerely hope our friend from Wisconsin [Mr.

STAFFORD] will not press his objection to such an extremely worthy measure as this which we are now considering.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, this is not the first time that Doctor Tittmann has been calling upon Congress for some special extraordinary relief.

Mr. EDMONDS. And it will not be the last time, either.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee, Mr. EDMONDS, says, "nor will it be the last time." I hope it will not be. I wish that all these faithful civilian servants of the Government who have retired on account of age may live long, but we have never established the precedent of pensioning a civil employee of the Government other than in the instances cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the case of Justice Moody, and the recent case of Justice Pitney. When that of Justice Moody was brought before Congress for consideration, there was considerable opposition to its award for fear it would establish a precedent. We all knew then that he was afflicted with a disease that rendered him unfit for further service on the Supreme Court, and it was an emergent case, in order to provide a vacancy so that the work of the court could be performed, and for that reason Congress made an exception. The cases of retired Army officers are not akin at all to this case. If we should allow this pension or gratuity of $150 a month in this case we would have to open the doors to many other similar cases. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Does the gentleman know that the former head of the Lighthouse Service was taken care of just in this way?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman refer to Doctor Kimball?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I am not sure about his name, but he was the former chairman of the Lighthouse Board, and they tell me at the department that that is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may have been exceptions. I recall the case of Doctor Kimball. It may have been necessary to create a vacancy in order to provide a younger man to fill that position rather than a person who had grown old in the service. It may have crept through on a general bill, but not in a private bill like this.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. In the case of Arthur Rump, of St. Louis, who had been but 15 years in the service, Congress passed a specific bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I think that bill passed by unanimous consent, not by reason of submission of the question to the decision of the House. He had suffered tremendous injuries in the service of the Government. The case appealed to me. There are other cases of that kind where persons have been injured in the service of the Government. He had received injuries while in the performance of service for the Government. Doctor Tittmann suffered no injuries by reason of his service. There are many superannuated employees of the Government who have retired who would be entitled to the same consideration on the part of Congress if we should award this man an honorarium of $1,800 a year.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FAMILY OF TATSUJI SAITO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1078) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the Government of Japan for the benefit of the family of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject, killed at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, May 25, 1916.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LIEUT. COL. HENRY C. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5210) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Henry C. Davis.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ANNA M. TOBIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2323) for the relief of Anna M. Tobin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve my objection. I did not know this was the bill in which the gentleman was interested.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to my friend that if objection is to be made it seems to me we do not gain anything by discussing the bill, and we do prevent the consideration of bills that might not be objected to. My hope is that after we dispose of the bills that are not objected to we may come back and take up the calendar and thrash out these matters that are objected to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. My hope is that I may convince the gentleman from Wisconsin so that he will withdraw his objection. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that this is a bill for the relief of a lady, Mrs. Tobin, of El Paso. The bill passed the House about two years ago, but for lack of time failed to pass the Senate. It passed the Senate over a year ago, but it failed to pass the House.

The history of this case is that Mrs. Tobin owns some property at a town called Tobin, about 8 miles from the city of El Paso, and close to Fort Bliss, a military post. The soldiers of the Pennsylvania National Guard that were camped there destroyed the property in the town. She asked General Clements to place a guard around the property and he refused to do it. At the time she made the request they had destroyed about $30 worth. He wanted to arrest them and put them in prison, but she said: "No; all I ask you to do is to place a guard around the property so that they will do no further damage." General Clements made an investigation and found that he was responsible for damages to the property. They had destroyed the house, taken doors off the hinges, taken bricks from the house, and all this was ascertained by General Clements, who found them doing it. The private guard that she placed around the building found them doing it.

Now, upon investigation by General Clements and Major Taggart they ascertained that the damage was $1,000, and they recommended that $1,000 be paid to this widow lady. There is an itemized statement, sworn to, and everything is set forth, and all the damages she sustained. Not only is this recommended by Major Taggart, but here is a letter from the Secretary of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inform the gentleman that I was not advised that any information in reference to this case had been inserted in the Record, and so I have not had the benefit of it. I wish to call attention to the difficulty I have had in allowing this bill to become a law. General Clements, who was the commanding officer, states that if his position had been carried out and not objected to by this woman further damage would not have been done. Permit me to read from page 2 of the report:

At the time of the original damage and complaint General Clements did offer to have the parties found upon the premises make restitution, but in the presence of the offenders the representation was made on behalf of Mrs. Tobin that she did not care that the boys should do this, but was anxious that a guard should be established about the premises for the protection thereof from further injury. General Clements is of the opinion that had he been permitted to handle this matter as he thought best, all future trouble would have been avoided and Mrs. Tobin saved the damage to her property and the expense of maintaining a civilian guard.

Here we have the owner of the property dissenting from the will of the commanding officer as to what is necessary for the control of the troops and who is of the opinion that if his will had been carried out there would have been no further transgression or depredation. She is now asking for relief from the very act which can be charged up to the generosity of her heart perhaps in not wanting to have the boys punished.

Mr. HUDSPETH. At this time there had only been about $38 damage. General Clements wanted to imprison these splendid young men, and this widow said "No; I do not want them in prison, for they have not done much damage; all I ask is that you place a guard around the property so that they will not commit any further damage."

Mr. STAFFORD. General Clements was in charge of the men who did the damage and had the right to say how the men should comport themselves and what should be the discipline, but his rule was interfered with and he yielded to the importunings of the owner of the property.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Let me read a part of General Clements's report. He says:

I am unable to report the exact damage done, but I do not believe that the estimate of $1,000 is excessive.

Now, that occurred after the lady had requested that a private guard be put around the property so that no further damage could take place.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not attacking the bill on the quantum of the damages but on the ground that the owner of the property dissented from the rule of the commanding officer, which he wanted to enforce.

Mr. HUDSPETH. She did not want the boys imprisoned for doing this small amount of damage, which amounted to $38. All she asked then was that a guard be placed there. She placed a private guard there and he caught them taking away bricks and pump engine and doors from the building, and so forth.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that the wishes of this woman did not have a thing to do with the officer's carrying out his military instructions or his military duties. Now, for him to come up and say that he permitted the depredations later because she did not want the men imprisoned is what is known in Army circles as "passing the buck." It is no answer to the charge that he permitted the destruction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, he could have exercised his full authority and punished the boys for the original depredation, but on an appeal to him by the owner of the property, who did not want to have it done, the commanding officer desisted. He offered to pay for the damage, but she declined to receive it.

Mr. RANKIN. All she asked then was that no further damage be done and that guards be placed around the property and the men restrained from committing further damages.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

WILLIAM HOWARD MAY ET AL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 2746, an act for the relief of William Howard May, ex-marshal of the Canal Zone; William K. Jackson, ex-district attorney of the Canal Zone; and John H. McLean, ex-paymaster of the Panama Canal, now deceased.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

ELIZABETH MARSH WATKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 841, an act for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a case that particularly ought to appeal to the Congress. Elizabeth Marsh Watkins was a pupil in the Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak., and while engaged in laundering at the request of the superintendent in charge was injured by the mangle that she was using. The palm of her hand was largely torn off, and the skin from the wrist was rolled down over her palm and fingers so that her hand has become seriously and permanently crippled. This bill passed the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress and I think in every Congress since that time, and has been favorably acted upon by the Committee on Claims of the House on at least two different occasions. I feel that in this case the objection ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. BURTON. How much does the bill provide?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in this case, as I remember it, the report shows that she is not permanently incapacitated from performing work. Her left hand has been disfigured, and she is able to do manual labor as before. Twenty-five hundred dollars is a pretty large sum to pay merely for disfigurement of the hand by doing work which she was not directed to do by the Government authorities.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I notice that Dr. W. O. Wetmore, of Washington, D. C., examined this girl at the time she was in Washington. He states in his report that the fingers of the left hand are atrophied and useless, and that contractures have occurred in the palmar fascia; also that as a result of the injury her nervous system in general fails to respond to normal stimuli and insomnia is present. That conforms with her own affidavit, which also appears in the record. She is in a condition to-day where she is able to do very little, if any, work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the testimony that she is to-day incapacitated from performing work? If that is the fact I do not wish to interpose any objection.

Mr. SNELL. Was that brought out at the hearings before the committee, that she was incapacitated? That is the important part of it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That certainly was brought out before the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the report that shows it.

Mr. EDMONDS. The report shows that she has very little use, if any, of this hand, if one could call that permanent incapacity. Here is the picture of the hand which was injured. She can not use the hand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the statement of the chairman of the committee, amplifying the report, which does not show that she is incapacitated, and the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON], I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, to compensate Elizabeth Marsh Watkins, of Wapala, S. Dak., for permanent bodily injuries sustained by her on the 8th day of November, 1908, at the Government Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

J. W. HARRELD.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the next bill on the calendar, H. R. 8025, for the relief of J. W. Harreld, be withdrawn from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. Taking it from the calendar would lay it on the table. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MES. M. P. RODGERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 4314, for the relief of Mrs. M. P. Rodgers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I object, and I ask that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RICHARD MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 9916, to provide for the issuing of a patent to Richard Murphy for a certain tract of land in what is known as the Big Pasture of Oklahoma, and upon which he has made full payment of purchase price.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the fact that on April 22, 1907, under the act of June 6, 1906, Richard Murphy made homestead entry 06742 upon the southwest quarter of section 13, in township 3 south of range 15 west, Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, and in June, 1916, made his full and final payment of all installments and interest thereon as required by said act and extension of payment acts and his bidding agreement therefor upon said tract, the said Richard Murphy has earned a valid title to said tract, and it is now provided that the land department shall issue a patent for said land to the said Richard Murphy.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to Richard Murphy patent to the southwest quarter of section 13, in township 3 south of range 15 west, Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, being homestead entry, Guthrie 06742.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill authorizing issuance of patent to Richard Murphy.

MEDICAL SOCIETY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 10973, to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved June 7, 1898, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

IRON GATES ON WEST EXECUTIVE AVENUE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the Senate bill 3046, an act to donate the gates at the head of West Executive Avenue, in the city of Washington, D. C., to the Hayes Memorial Museum, Fremont, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DONATING CERTAIN INDIAN LANDS, STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 10841, authorizing the transfer of 500 feet of Indian land, in the State of Washington, for a public school to which Indian children shall be admitted without payment of tuition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this to carry with it the construction of a new school building, which is not provided for in the Indian bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Some gentleman from the Indian Committee will have to answer that.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is to provide additional land for the use of a public school.

Mr. BLANTON. Already in existence?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not going to require the building of a new one out there not authorized by the present bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not that I know of.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman on the Indian Committee?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not on all the committees of the House; the Appropriations Committee is sufficient to keep me occupied.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the reason I made the inquiry; I did not think the gentleman could speak for the Indian Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking on this bill, so far as the bill itself shows, and the report; it is for the transfer of Government lands for public-school purposes to which Indian children shall be admitted without payment of tuition. It safeguards the interests of the Government in every way, donating land owned by the Government for public-school purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to take half a minute. The point I am making is this, that, unless it is a school already built that is provided for in the Indian bill, if we pass this measure it will make in order an appropriation that is to come afterwards to build public schools that has not had legislative consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. The facts are these. The Government owned some lands—

Mr. BLANTON. Is there a school building already established?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just to have the facts correct, the Government owns some land adjoining a public-school building. This public school is attended 60 per cent by Indian pupils. By reason of their accepting the Indian children, it is proposed to give them additional land without expense—a very commendable course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to transfer and convey to school district No. 30, in Ferry County, State of Washington, being the Meteor-Inchelium school district, the north 500 feet of lot 5 in section 5, township 32 north, range 37 east, Willamette meridian, for public-school use, upon condition that Indian children shall be admitted to the schools of said district without discrimination, and that any Indian children who are not Federal wards shall be admitted without payment of tuition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HORACE G. KNOWLES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8656) for the relief of Horace G. Knowles.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

SOUTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7010) for the relief of the Southern Transportation Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Southern Transportation Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, and doing business in the State of Virginia, owners of the barge Moccasin, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said barge Moccasin and the United States Navy lighter No 467, in tow of Navy tug Kewadin in Hampton Roads, Va., on the 5th day of October, 1920, may be sued for by the said Southern Transportation Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Southern Transportation Co. or against the said Southern Transportation Co. in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the figures "457" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "462."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 1, strike out the word "Pennsylvania" and insert in lieu thereof "New Jersey."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the chairman whether the damage had arisen from the barge or from the merchandise on the barge?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; they were incurred in regard to a collision.

Mr. WATSON. Did they arise out of damages sustained by the barge or the merchandise also?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; I believe not.

Mr. WATSON. Is the gentleman sure? Because it would make a great difference whether it was damages to the barge or merchandise in the barge. It does not say in the report.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; it does not say in the report, but it does say in the bill for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the barge and a United States Navy lighter.

Mr. WATSON. Arising out of damages sustained by the barge. Now, whether it includes merchandise in the barge makes some difference, whether it was insured or not, and whether the Government was responsible.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the Government is responsible, why would that make any difference?

Mr. WATSON. We ought to know the facts.

Mr. EDMONDS. My understanding is that it was a collision between the barge and a lighter. I never heard any report made of its being in regard to merchandise on the barge.

Mr. WATSON. It ought to be clearly set forth. There might be half a dozen people hurt and damages brought.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; there is nothing of that kind; and all of our cases have been about the same in regard to admiralty cases.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GULF, FLORIDA & ALABAMA RAILWAY CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2599) for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

NAVAJO TIMBER CO. OF DELAWARE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1945) to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co. of Delaware for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I rise to obtain information from the committee as to whether the $5,000 forfeit money that was deposited by the Navajo Lumber & Timber Co., which the late Secretary Lane reported against, has ever been returned to the company.

Mr. EDMONDS. Not that I know of.

Mr. BURTON. This is not a bill of mine, but it is one in which my colleague [Mr. KNIGHT] is interested. He is absent to-day. They have abandoned, as I understand, the other claim; at least there is no bill pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what I wanted to ascertain. The Secretary of the Interior in 1915 offered no objection to the reimbursement and return of this $5,000, but he strenuously objected to the return of a like sum by another company composed of the same persons as this company.

Mr. BURTON. Practically the same persons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States standing to the credit of the fund "Indian moneys, proceeds of labor, Fort Apache Indians," the sum of $4,904.10, the same to be a reimbursement for a deposit made by said Navajo Timber Co. with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the United States on October 15, 1913, to accompany a bid for the purchase of certain timber on the Apache and Sitgreaves National Forests, Ariz., and on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of public business in his district.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to introduce a bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I introduce a bill proposing to amend the Federal reserve act, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and so referred.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill (S. 4427) repealing the act approved April 13, 1920, entitled "An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved April 13, 1920, being Public No. 170, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator, will he explain briefly the proposed amendment to the law?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the proposed amendment to the Federal reserve act repeals the amendment to that act under which a progressive interest rate was charged to a bank in my State of 87½ per cent. While we have forced a reduction of the rediscount rate by the fight which I and others have made here, the power under which the interest rate to which I have referred was charged is still retained in the act. I want to repeal that portion of that act. That is my purpose in offering the proposed amendment to the Federal reserve act.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency have no desire to assume any responsibility that the Senate does not wish to impose upon it, but, if the practice is to become chronic of referring bills to committees with an eye single to the friendliness of the committee, I think we may all feel that it will demoralize our whole legislative procedure. I think the Senate ought to express its opinion with regard to the reference asked for by the Senator from Alabama. I object to the bill being referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the progressive interest rate was applied nowhere in the country except in the agricultural sections of the South and West. It was not applied in New England, from which section my friend the Senator from Connecticut comes; it was not applied in the East; indeed, it was applied nowhere except in the cotton-growing States of the South and in the grain-growing and cattle-raising States in the western section of the country. I want a committee to consider the bill that represents the agricultural interests of the country, a committee that is acquainted with the distress and suffering endured by these people under the murderous—for that is what it was—progressive interest rate imposed by the Federal Reserve Board. No man in the Senate or out of it can defend a progressive interest rate that imposed upon a little bank in south Alabama 87½ per cent. The fact that such an interest rate was charged is not disputed and can not be disputed. The Federal Reserve Board has admitted that such a rate was charged. The governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has admitted that the rate was charged.

Mr. President, the provision of the law which I seek to repeal has worked a great hardship upon the people of my State, upon the people of the South generally, and upon the people of the West. It ought not to remain in the law. I do not believe that some of the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives who voted for it knew what they were voting for when they incorporated it in the law. I have stated on this floor a number of times that Governor Harding told the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that the board did not intend to apply the provisions of that section of the law in the agricultural section; that they intended to protect the agricultural sections by it, but did intend to apply it in New York and some other large cities that were obtaining more money than they were entitled to obtain. When, however, the board were granted this authority they did not apply it to New York at all, or to any other large city in the East or North; they applied it nowhere except in those sections where they promised not to apply it. The whole thing is stamped all over with fraud and deception. It ought not to have been in the law at all; but it was placed in the law by a Republican Congress and is in the law now.

I have waited about introducing my amendment because I saw a statement some time ago from the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Crissinger, who is a good man, that he favored reducing the rediscount rate. That position was in line with the resolution which I had already introduced in the Senate. He said that the rediscount rate ought to be reduced. Pressure has been brought to bear and the rediscount rate has been reduced. While it was being reduced there was being accomplished exactly what I was trying to accomplish. The time has now come before this Congress adjourns to pluck that awful provision out of the law, root and branch, and destroy it.

I would not, Mr. President, if I could help it, permit that provision to remain in the law under any Federal Reserve Board, I do not care what its political complexion might be. I saw the power wielded; I saw how it was applied when the South was in the throes of financial distress. When the Federal Reserve Board should have gone to our people's rescue, I saw the provision of the law which I seek to have repealed used as a club to strike the South and West to their knees, and literally strip those sections of the accumulations of a lifetime. I saw it impose upon my section debts under which my people will labor for 5 or 10 years to come before they get rid of them. I saw swept away from farmers under this provision of the law homes and farms that they will never recover. It ought not to be permitted to remain in the law.

I object to referring the bill to a committee a majority of whose members defended the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy. I do not want the bill to go into the hands of a committee that is hostile to it. We might just as well talk plainly. If the Senator from Connecticut wants to make the issue, let us see who is on the side of the distressed farmers of the United States. I want action on the bill; I want it reported back. I think, to be frank, that the Agricultural Committee will report it back promptly and favorably. If I had not thought so, I would not have asked that the bill be referred to that committee.

Mr. President, why should the bill go to the Banking and Currency Committee? The Agricultural Committee is supposed to look out for the agricultural interests. The agricultural interests have been imposed upon by the provision of the law which I seek to repeal. Now, to which committee can we look for quick and favorable action? To the Agricultural Committee, which knows the condition of and sympathizes with the farmers, or a committee some members of which defended the Federal Reserve Board all during the grinding process of deflation which destroyed billions of dollars' worth of property in the United States?

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this proposition at length. I have stated the situation. This provision ought to be taken out of the law. Bills have been referred to committees without objection, and I hope the Senator from Connecticut will not object to the Agricultural Committee having consideration of this matter, because the millions of people in the agricultural sections are the people injuriously affected by the operation of this provision. They are the only people affected by it, and the Agricultural Committee is supposed to represent their interests. Why should not this bill be referred to that committee? I simply want to do what is right and just in this matter. I think it ought to be referred to that committee, because it is a serious matter to the farmers of the country. I am a member of that committee.

While we are here trying to legislate or pretending to legislate for the benefit of the farmer, why not do something of real value for him? There will be genuine rejoicing all over the agricultural sections when this octopus is plucked out of this measure—the progressive interest rate—sneaked in, covered all over with false pretenses and fraud, while they were telling out in the open that they never intended to apply it to the agricultural sections, and I know that in the outset they never intended to apply it anywhere else. Deception was employed as the vehicle on which to carry this provision into the law, and after they got it they struck down the people of the whole South and the West and now we are seeking to get out from under it; and the Senator from Connecticut, who is posing now as the friend of the farmer, would have us believe that he would really enact some legislation for the relief of the farmer. It is really touching to me, Mr. President, when I behold that situation. When I see the Senator from Connecticut, the arch champion of deflation, coming bearing gifts to the farmer, it touches me deeply. If it were not for taking up the time of the Senate, I would shed tears [laughter]; but, Mr. President, whenever you touch on a vital proposition to certain big interests, see how quickly the Senator from Connecticut springs to his feet. I put my finger on the sore spot in this whole business when I undertake to uproot this progressive interest-rate provision. Yes, the Senator from Connecticut springs to his feet. He knows that the forces are gathering now to do something of value in this matter. He objects to having the bill sent to the Agricultural Committee. Why? Why? Why does the Senator object? He is the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and he is protesting against the reference of this bill to any other committee but his own committee.

Mr. President, a lot of strange things happen in this Chamber; but as these matters unfold and these developments come we do get enough into the RECORD for the people who read it to know where their friends are and who their friends are.

I think the bill that I have introduced ought to be referred to the Agricultural Committee. I have stated before that the agricultural interests were the interests that were preyed upon by the provision that I want to strike out and that the Agricultural Committee is supposed to represent those interests, and I asked that my bill be referred to that committee. The Vice President referred it to the committee, but the Senator from Connecticut objected, and I now ask that it be referred to the Agricultural Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the request of the Senator from Alabama, the Chair stated that without objection the bill would be received and so referred. Is there objection?

Mr. McLEAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object to the introduction of the bill or to the reference?

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to its going to the Committee on Banking and Currency or to the Committee on Finance, either one of them. Manifestly, it should go to one or the other of these committees.

The Senator says that this frequently has been done. That is just the trouble. The bill should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but that committee has no desire to resume responsibility that the Senate does not wish to impose upon the committee. As the Senator says, it has been done frequently. Bills are being sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that should go to the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Banking and Currency. They are reported out the next day. There is just as much justification for referring a tariff bill to the Agricultural Committee, or a Post Office bill to the Agricultural Committee, or any other bill and all the bills to the Agricultural Committee, as there is for referring this particular bill to it. If the Senator is right in his position, the only thing for us to do is to abolish all the standing committees and appoint each Member of this body a committee to report out his own bill. That is what it will lead to if the habit becomes confirmed; and I shall insist upon the Senate expressing its opinion with regard to this matter before the bill is referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut make any motion?

Mr. McLEAN. If I made a motion, it would be to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have no objection to its lying on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I move to amend the motion by requiring the committee to report it back to the Senate within five days.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Wisconsin thinks he can dispose of this matter in that way, let him take the responsibility. He will find that the regular order will result in a two-hour speech from me.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BROOKHART.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Alabama will yield, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, the speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] before the Foreign Relations Council of New York, delivered last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF SENATOR SMITH W. BROOKHART, OF IOWA, DELIVERED TO THE COUNCIL OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF NEW YORK CITY ON THE EVENING OF JANUARY 26, 1923.

Gentlemen of the Council of Foreign Relations: You have invited me to speak to you of the sentiment and the attitude of the farmers, the laborers, and the soldiers toward our foreign affairs. Your invitation seemed to imply the existence of a sectional or mid-western sentiment, and ask for its special interpretation. This is error. While there is a distinct farmer thought and sentiment, a distinct labor thought and sentiment, and likewise a distinct soldier thought and sentiment, still all are national and not sectional. They are also quite well organized and reasonably consistent, and they are also very largely harmonious one with another. At this time there is no substantial difference in the national economic thought of the fruit grower of the Pacific coast, the cattle raiser of the mountain ranges, the cotton grower of the South, the grain grower of the West, and the dairyman of the East. I have been in the conventions of all of them and their thought runs the same upon the great questions of production, processing, credit, transportation, and marketing. Their differences are almost entirely of knowledge and information and not of intention or purpose, and they are being rapidly eliminated. Among labor the machinists of Boston, San Antonio, and of Seattle are the same, and they are also one with the locomotive engineer, the telegrapher, the plumber, the plasterer, and even common and unorganized labor. The most recent development is harmony of thought between the farmer and labor as to both economic questions and political action. While the soldiers have a distinct economic question of their own, still the vast majority of them are farmers and laborers, and they join in the same general conclusion of thought. It is my intention to give you a plain and truthful account of this great national movement as it relates to foreign affairs, and I shall do my best to give it to you without restraint or coloring and exactly as I see it.

This new thought is still more domestic than foreign, but it is resolving every question upon the same principles. It can neither be understood nor appreciated without a knowledge of the basic facts that have brought the farmer and the laborer together to fight for their economic and political rights, and also a knowledge of the cooperative remedies they have decided to use. I will therefore preface this discussion with a brief picture of this situation, the mental picture of the farmer and the laborer themselves.

Perhaps not exceeding 40 per cent of our people can be rated as farmers. They have a capital investment of about $80,000,000,000, which is perhaps less than one-third of the national wealth, and therefore less than a per capita proportion without regard to indebtedness. Farming is also a business and a workshop. The farmer is a laborer and he ought to be a business man. Economic conditions have intensified his labor and largely destroyed his functions as a business man. He has no voice in the price he will receive for his products. He has no voice in the price he will pay for his equipment. He has no power to add in his cost of production, he can charge no profit, and he toils without the assurance of any wage. In the past he has solved these conditions by moving to new fields, but those days are now over. Necessity has forced him to survey the whole situation and look for a new way out. He finds about 35 per cent of our people are laborers with far less proportion of capital than himself, and about 15 per cent of brain workers also with a less proportion. The other 10 per cent, or thereabouts, he rates as middlemen, capitalists, and profiteers. He finds this small class in possession of more than half of the national wealth. He finds it in control of most of the machinery of production, of processing, of credit, of transportation, and of marketing. He finds its influence powerful in every department of our Government and its rewards vastly more than a majority of our net national income. He wonders, he figures, he thinks, he decides, he acts. Of all these I speak to you tonight, and since I am facing an assemblage of the most distinguished representatives of capital in America it would be worse than futile if I did not bring the real voice of the American farmer and the American laborer.

The farmer is a producer, but he is also the greatest of the consumers of the products of labor. Labor is a producer, but it is also the greatest consumer of the products of the farm. Out of the dollar which the laboring man pays for the products of the farm the farmer gets 37 cents. That is the first half of the story. When reversed the laboring man claims that out of the dollar which the farmer pays for the products of labor the laboring man gets less than 35 cents. The cost of processing and distribution is 63 per cent one way and 65 per cent the other. This is not a new condition developed by the war; it existed prior thereto. In 1912 the farmers got $6,000,000,000 for their crops which they sold, but the consumers paid $13,000,000,000 for them. Is this a just charge for the service between the producer and the consumer? Both the farmer and the laboring man have reached the definite conclusion that it is excessive. Labor therefore refuses to fight the farmer all forenoon in an effort to further reduce the little 37 per cent the farmer is now getting, and the farmer refuses to fight labor in the afternoon to reduce the 35 per cent which labor is getting.

Both have designated the middleman as their common economic enemy, and this includes the agencies of processing, of credit, of transportation, and of marketing. They point to the unconscionable profits of oil, steel, and coal, and to their stupendous stock dividends. They check their income taxes and find all added in and paid by the consumer. They view a valuation of $19,000,000,000 for the railroads and then observe that all the stocks and all the bonds representing all the value are selling on the market for $12,000,000,000, according to their own admission. They see a credit system, built largely upon their own deposits, mobilizing these deposits for every other industry and inflating and deflating without their knowledge or consent. They see their market made by margins on the board of trade or the cotton exchange, and they call it the system of the gambler. The farmer ships his grain or live stock and after paying his freight does not have enough left to pay his taxes. The wages of labor are gone long before its families are properly fed, clothed, housed, and educated. They have lost faith in the financial leaders. They denounce the whole scheme of princely salaries and profits taken by economic power as taxation without representation. They look for a remedy; yes, and they have found it.

This remedy was invented by labor. It was 28 poor flannel weavers in 1843 who saved their pennies for a year and a half, until, with a pound each, or $140, they started the little cooperative store at Rochdale, England. No enterprise ever had a smaller beginning. None ever had such large promises for the economic welfare of humanity. These simple-minded toilers laid down the biggest, soundest, broadest, most enterprising, and most successful business principles that have ever been promulgated in this world. They have survived in spite of competition, of persecution, and of war. The essential parts in these principles are:

1. In the cooperative enterprise each member has one vote. All producers and consumers are entitled to be members, and capital does not vote.

2. The wages or earnings of capital are fixed like the wages of men, and they shall not exceed the usual legal interest rate.

3. One-fourth of the net profits are held in the business and the other three-fourths are distributed to the members in proportion to their volume of trade with the enterprise.

The minor rules of operation are:

1. Goods shall be sold at the prevalent current market prices.

2. All transactions shall be for cash.

3. Societies federate with the neighboring societies or be established as branches.

4. Every society shall teach cooperation.

Upon this vision and this method this little society has grown into a membership of over 4,000,000 families, which means over one-third of the total population of Great Britain.

Now what do we find? The cooperative societies of Great Britain distribute over a billion dollars' worth of commodities to their members annually. The "profit," or, more properly speaking, the "saving," to their members amounts to $100,000,000 a year. Of this amount $65,000,000 annually are returned in cash to the members in the form of "dividends," or savings returns. The British Wholesale Society supplies 1,500 societies. It owns its own steamships. It has 13 great warehouses. It is the largest purchaser of Canadian wheat. Steam trawlers owned by the cooperatives catch tons and tons of fish, which are dried at fishing stations in the north of England. Its 11 flour mills are the largest in Great Britain. These mills turn out 35 tons of flour every hour for the people who own the mills.

One of the largest bakeries in the world is owned by the cooperators of Glasgow. The British Cooperative Wholesale has 68 factories, which turn out products for their societies' use valued at £30,000,000 annually. Their soap works make 500 tons of soap a week. They produce 4,000,000 pairs of boots annually in the largest shoe factories of England. They conduct three great printing plants. They even operate automobile factories making motors for their own service. They own their own coal mines. (These are figures for two years ago. There are now 108 factories, an increase of 40.)

They bring their own currants from Greece to be made into plum puddings in their own great factories. Besides foodstuffs, the British cooperators produce almost every other commodity—watches, furniture, tinware, machinery, clothing, tobacco, chemicals, leather goods, and brushes. Their total products are five times greater than those of the private manufacturers' association. They provide concerts and entertainments. Their social work embraces most every branch of human service; it serves not cooperators alone but is of wide public benefit. They conduct life-saving stations on the coast and administer large funds for the relief of sufferers from famine and unemployment. Their banking department, with an annual turnover in 1919 of £500,000,000, is next to the Bank of England in importance. Its growth is steady. In the first half of 1920 its turnover increased 20 per cent. One-half of the industrial life and accident insurance in Great Britain is written by the cooperative society. Their life insurance business is carried on at a cost of one-fourth of that which the profit-making companies pay.

The outstanding feature, however, about this voluntary association of consumers in the British cooperative movement is its great and continued success extending over nearly a century. This success is alike in retail distribution, in wholesaling, and in manufacturing. It remains even in its present prosperity, as it began, an enterprise essentially of the wage earners. The members themselves, by combining their individual savings, have at all times supplied the capital that their enterprises have required, without borrowing from bankers or the public. They have proved that the Rochdale method removes the need of capitalistic credit or philanthropic assistance; that in the whole range of their great and varied enterprises, they need pay no toll to anyone outside of their association.

It is interesting to note in Great Britain that while cooperative labor gets slightly higher wages than are paid in the same trade in private business, yet its managers and leaders have salaries that would be scorned by captains of industry in competitive organizations of similar character. The movement is training thousands of highly efficient executives. Some go into capitalistic employment; most of them remain loyal to the movement. One, upon being offered a position with higher pay in private business, said: "My fellow cooperators pay me sufficient to satisfy my needs. I am happy serving the people. I should not be happy serving you at the expense of the people." He is no exception. Among many others such as he is William Maxwell, president of the Scottish Wholesale Society (now retired, Robert Stewart succeeding), a federation of 266 consumers' societies. At a yearly salary of £350, he organized 37 factories in 27 years. In 1919 the Scottish Wholesale manufactured over £6,000,000 worth of goods, it did a business of over £27,000,000, and carried a reserve and insurance fund of £1,200,000. The sales of the first half of 1920 showed an increase of 27 per cent. President Thorpe of the British Cooperative Wholesale at present receives £850 yearly. He has 30,000 workers under his direction, in 68 factories, mills, and warehouses. (Now 108.) The directors of the wholesale receive a yearly salary of only £500. This wholesale society in 1920 did a business of £100,000,000, an increase of 23 per cent over 1919.

In 1919 the British and Scottish Wholesales together did a business of £115,000,000. In Great Britain they are steadily acquiring farms, now totaling 34,000 acres (two years ago, now 40,000 acres), valued at over £2,000,000, on which are produced quantities of fruits, vegetables, and dairy products. They own 10,000 acres of Canadian wheatlands. The British and Scottish Wholesales together own 60,000 acres of tea plantations in Ceylon and southern India. The British Wholesale owns vineyards in Spain, and controls vast tracts of land in West Africa for the growing of palm trees, from which oil for their soap factories is procured.

Now, I must say to you, those 28 poor weavers had a vision as great as Henry Ford, and they have accomplished as Democrats what he is doing as an autocrat. It took longer, but they have builded better for the future and have now attained a higher speed and wider field.

This is one achievement of labor, and you ask, What proof is there that it will succeed with farmers? Those principles were transplanted to Denmark by farmers. They gave them Government aid by electing a farmer parliament, and under this stimulus their progress has been much more rapid and the proportion of success much greater than in Great Britain. Practically all of the farmers have joined the associations. They have 46 cooperative packing plants which produce the best products in the world. They have cooperative creameries and cheese factories. They have 521 cooperative banks with a cooperative reserve. They have the best Government cooperative land-credit system in the world and highly efficient Government transportation. They have cooperative buying of most of their needs, and their cooperative marketing is complete.

The result of all this has been to change the ownership of land from a few families, until 89.9 per cent of the farmers own and operate their own farms. This is the largest percentage in the world. Their cost of distribution has been reduced to 25 or 28 per cent, as compared with 63 or 65 per cent under our system. In per capita wealth they stood twenty-seventh among the nations of the world 40 years ago, and to-day they are second. They have established a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

I have cited these conspicuous examples, but similar cases are found in nearly all countries—over 30 countries, 6 surpassing Great Britain in proportion. The growth of cooperation in recent years is almost beyond belief and especially in the United States. The fruit growers of California do an annual business of over $250,000,000. The Farmers' Union of Kansas is doing more than $200,000,000 per year of cooperative business, and Nebraska is not far behind. The Equity Cooperative Exchange, of St. Paul, does an enormous grain business. The largest commission houses in Chicago, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Buffalo, Omaha, Sioux City, and St. Joseph are cooperative. There are over 4,000 cooperative elevators, over 2,000 cooperative stores, many thousand cooperative shipping associations, and a good start on cooperative banks. The Farm Bureau was assisted in its organization by the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce to put a stop to this cooperative progress, but it has already become a most ardent champion. At this moment practically every farmer is a believer in economic cooperation of producer and consumer as the final and complete solution of our staggering difficulties. In this he is joined by practically every laboring man and by a vast majority of the soldiers.

The soldiers have a special demand for adjusted compensation upon the war profiteers and the peace profiteers, and in this they are joined by all the farmers and by all the laborers. This union of thought manifested itself in the last election, where these three great blocs turned out many of their enemies and filled their places with friends of this great cooperative program.

And now, perhaps, you are wondering how all of this, if true, can affect our foreign relations. I do not come before you as a technical student of foreign affairs. Neither do the farmers nor the laborers nor the soldiers have such detailed and technical knowledge. But I can say this to you, that all of them have reached one conclusion as to international statesmanship. This can be described by one word, and that word is "failure." They see this statesmanship guided by economic power and economic greed. They see it building navies and armies to control the land and rule the sea. They see its instruments of destruction in the air and under the ocean. They see it in the grip of world war organized for the murder of the human race. They see its wake of revolution and pestilence and death. They cry out with one voice, "Failure."

This whole failure they attribute to economic causes. If a cure can be found for economic evils and inefficiency, they believe political unrest will cease. They are distrustful of all the old remedies. A League of Nations is proposed. They see most of its 14 points discarded. They attribute this to financial considerations, and they oppose it. It is proposed to cancel the war debt. They see in this a plan of the international bankers to make more easy the collection of their private debts, and this they also oppose. Then they hark back to first principles for a remedy—to the weavers of Rochdale. They ask, why not an international cooperative exchange agency, with cooperative associations from all countries doing business with us as members. It is just as easy to organize as a corporation. It is just as easy to develop as the great English Cooperative Wholesale, which already reaches around the world. It is not a dream or theory. It is the oldest, best developed, and most successful business system in the world. It is the Sermon on the Mount in business.

But, you say, cooperation is of slow growth, and there would be no immediate relief in adopting it as an international system. Well, there is no immediate relief in sight under any system that has been proposed. Besides, cooperation has been slow because it always had to fight its way against the organized competitive system and even unfavorable government action. In Denmark, as soon as it controlled the Government, its growth became much more rapid than any other business. If it could have the support instead of the opposition of the leaders of business in our country, its growth and soundness would be immeasurable.

I want to make to this council a specific proposition. I say to you it is within your power to lead this movement to a speedy and world-wide success. Under the Constitution Congress regulates commerce with foreign nations and among the States. If this council would ask Congress to require that all business in interstate and foreign commerce shall be transacted under a Federal charter; that the terms of the charter shall be the Rochdale cooperative system of producers and consumers; that all antitrust laws be repealed as soon as this is effected; every farmer, every laboring man, and every soldier should join in that request. Its enactment into law under such leadership and with such support would mean its certain success. Such a step would mean more for the welfare of the human race, more for the advancement of civilization, than any step taken by any generation since the money changers were cast out of the temple of Jerusalem.

However, I am not optimistic enough to expect you to adopt this suggestion at once, but I am willing to point out what really is to be expected. I am coming back to New York, but next time I expect to meet the farmers, the laborers, and the soldiers themselves. And finally I expect the farm bloc, the labor bloc, the soldier bloc, and the mothers' bloc to turn more Members out of Congress until they have a majority in both Houses, and then they will proceed to a settlement of these great economic questions, both domestic and foreign, upon the simple principles of cooperation.

CONDITIONS IN EUROPE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to have read, Mr. President, an editorial that appeared in the Dayton Daily News of January 24. It is an editorial which strikes me as so important and interesting that it should be read to the Senate. It is not long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the editorial.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[From the Dayton Daily News of Wednesday, January 24, 1923.]

AMERICA GIVES UP THE SHIP!
(Editorial.)

The most tragic evidence of governmental infirmity in our time is presented in to-day's news dispatches from Washington. The administration has given out a statement that in its view it is entirely useless to attempt any participation by America in the threatening situation in Europe. In view of this official pronouncement, it will be interesting to recall very recent events.

When the forces of public opinion began moving even the Senate of the United States to action a fortnight ago Mr. Hughes, the Secretary of State, in an address at New Haven, said that the European question had become a world question, and that obviously, since we were a part of the world economically and otherwise, we were concerned about it.

This assurance was accepted in good faith in the Senate, where two things happened—Senator BORAH's proposal to appoint international experts was dropped and the Robinson resolution, which would have authorized our active participation in the deliberations of the Reparation Commission, was abandoned. Thus was indicated a disposition on the part of the Senate to let Mr. Hughes proceed in his own way. In time of stress particularly it is the substance of things rather than the details that claim interest. The action of the Senate bore but one interpretation, which was that the administration in its announced purpose of exercising its right to deal with foreign powers was entitled to every unrestricted facility in the working out of a definite policy. There was, however, some impatience shown in the expressed belief that Mr. Hughes was both slow and noncommunicative. As the days came and went and nothing was done, rumor persisted that the President, Ambassador George Harvey, and Secretary Hughes were not in agreement and that the last-named public officer would resign his position. This was denied, and within 24 hours comes the startling announcement that nothing is to be done, and that it is useless now to try. In order to get the full meaning of the pathetic surrender, these words from the official statement should be reproduced:

"In answer to suggestions that the United States protest against the French course it was pointed out that there was no foreknowledge of the nature of the occupation. And, it was added for the administration viewpoint, to protest now could not fail to be viewed by France as calculated to stiffen German resistance, which must arouse French resentment and impede any future American effort toward helpfulness."

Is it possible that we must employ Gladstone's denunciation of Disraeli when he said, "Statesmanship in your view is the art of governing people by deceiving them"?

No foreknowledge of the nature of the occupation!

Every man, woman, and child who reads the newspapers of this country knew not only of the announced intention to invade the Ruhr but almost the exact hour when the advance was to be made. The administration would lead the public to believe that it knew less as to what was going on than the man in the street. And now that the thing has actually happened, the Government of the United States can not in any "seemly" fashion express protest because it might "stiffen German resistance."

There is but one conclusion which the present deplorable state of things in Washington justifies, and it is that the administration gives up the ship. It admits failure, and practically announces that there is no use in making any attempt to render the aid which only America can give.

Suppose that General Pershing had announced when the American doughboys first hit the front line that the Hindenberg intrenchments were impregnable and it was useless to try to go forward. The blush of shame would have come to the cheek of every real American, and the citizen who strips himself of his political prejudices and calmly analyzes the meaning of the administration announcement can not but feel ashamed now that America has been subjected to this dreadful spectacle. Anywhere else on earth where government is both responsible and responsive to public opinion there would be a complete change, not only in the policy of government but the personnel as well. In England there would be an immediate recall, and the same would be true in Canada. Very recently a vote of confidence was denied the German Government, and Chancellor Wirth promptly tendered his resignation. Under our constitutional system we are simply hog tied, unless the President brings to the head of the State Department a man of imaginative and constructive humanitarianism. This is suggested under the assumption that the present surrender comes from the State Department. If the President himself is in actual touch with the situation and indorses what is going on, then there is no hope for two years, unless the potential forces of an aroused public opinion are asserted against the present Executive attitude.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that Senate bill 4427 was introduced; that there was no objection to its being introduced, but that there is objection to its proposed reference, not to its lying on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understood the Senator from Connecticut to move to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I moved to amend his motion so as to require the committee to report the bill back in five days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Connecticut to make that motion.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I said that if I were to make a motion I would move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but that I was perfectly willing that it should lie on the table. I am rather desirous that the bill shall lie on the table, and that it be taken up Monday, and that we get a vote on the Senator's proposition as to where it shall be referred. I am perfectly willing to have that understanding with the Senator—that it shall lie on the table and come up Monday and that we have a vote on it then.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the Senator's last statement? I did not hear it.

Mr. McLEAN. That the bill shall lie on the table until Monday, that the Senator shall have the privilege of bringing it up on Monday, and that there shall be a vote of the Senate at that time as to the committee to which it shall be referred.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am anxious to get action on it right away, and get it referred to the Committee on Agriculture. We might be able to get a meeting of that committee this afternoon and report it back.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if it could be understood that we would have a vote without further debate I would have no objection to having a vote now on the motion to refer.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, under the statement of the Senator from Connecticut that the bill may lie on the table until Monday, and that we may at that time vote as to the committee to which it shall be referred, I am willing that that course be taken.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would not want my silence to be construed as giving consent, but if the vote may be taken before 2 o'clock on Monday, if we adjourn to-morrow, that will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have the vote taken early after we convene on Monday.

Mr. LENROOT. I said that if we could get a vote before the unfinished business is laid before the Senate on Monday it would be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. HEFLIN. With the understanding that we do get a vote on Monday before 2 o'clock, Mr. President, I am willing that it go over, and for the present I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection having been made to the reference proposed, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has spoken so many, many times in this Chamber claiming that there was a bank in his district that was compelled to pay 87½ per cent interest. I think the whole history of that matter ought to go into the RECORD, so that if those who read the RECORD have taken any notice of the statements made they may know the whole history of the case. I shall not take the time to go into the details of it at this time—

Mr. HEFLIN. I may say to the Senator from Utah that I had printed the correspondence between the governor of the bank at Atlanta and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board and John Skelton Williams, who was then Comptroller of the Currency, in which the whole history of it was gone into. That was printed in the RECORD in July of last year.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what RECORD it was, but I want to have the record printed as it really exists. In the report of the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board, made in response to a Senate resolution of December 6, 1922, relative to the Federal Reserve Banks of Atlanta, St. Louis, Dallas, and Kansas City, he said:

Even in the much quoted case of the bank of the Atlanta district, which paid a maximum rate of 87½ per cent on a small portion of its excess borrowings during the period ending September 30, 1920, we find that that bank was charged only 13.37 per cent on total borrowings during the period from June to November, when it was assessed progressive rates, and only 8.8 per cent of their charges in excess of 12 per cent were rebated.

I have a letter from Mr. Platt, the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board, in answer to what appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 19, on page 2030, which reads as follows:

I noticed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, page 2030, when you offered for printing the Federal Reserve Board's answer to Senate Resolution 335, that Senator HEFLIN said, "I am frank to say to the Senator from Utah that I intend to seek to have the money wrongfully collected from various individuals and banks paid back to them." The next paragraph seems to indicate that he means all interest above 12 per cent, although the resolution itself might infer that he meant all interest above 10 per cent.

It may be interesting for you to know just how much the amounts involved would be if all interest on total borrowings for any period above 10 per cent were to be refunded. In the Atlanta district, as we figure it, the amount to be refunded would be $14.07, which is probably high, as we have figured the interest on basic line borrowings at 6 per cent, though in many cases it was lower than that because of borrowings secured by Liberty bonds or Treasury certificates. In the St. Louis district it would amount to $5,647.99, but of this amount $5,494 was paid by one bank which was criminally mismanaged, some of the officers of which were afterwards convicted and sentenced. In the Kansas City district it would amount to $139.27, while in the Dallas district, as stated in the letter of transmittal, no bank at any time paid more than 8½ per cent and only one bank paid above 8 per cent on total borrowings for any one period. Eliminating the one bank in the St. Louis district, which, as I have said, was criminally mismanaged, the total refund would be $307.33 for all three districts, and this, as I have above indicated, is probably high because we have used 6 per cent as applying to all the basic borrowings.

As these cases are so few in number it would be comparatively a simple matter to obtain from the three reserve banks involved the exact amounts which might be refunded above 10 per cent. In only one case, as we have the figures now, would they amount to more than $75 to any one bank.

That is signed by the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board. So that the whole story may be read in the RECORD, I ask that the letter from the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board, transmitting the answer to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama, be printed in the RECORD in order that those who want to see what the truth of this matter is can learn it from that.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it very long?

Mr. SMOOT. Not nearly as long as the one the Senator had printed in the RECORD the other day.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear that. Then why not have it read?

Mr. SMOOT. It is too long to read; it contains a lot of figures.

Mr. HARRISON. The one I presented was not too long to read. The Senator from Utah was about the only one who did not listen to it. Does the Senator object to having the Secretary read this letter which he now proposes to have put in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I do not think it is necessary to have all the figures read.

Mr. HARRISON. While we are discussing the matter, it is a very good time to know what is in the letter. I ask that it be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator wants all of the figures read page by page.

Mr. HARRISON. No; just the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. I would be glad to have that read. I have no objection to that part of it being read.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before it is read, I want to say to the Senator that I dispute the statement, as I understood it, of the acting governor that they did charge only 8½ per cent. I have the figures here out of their own report to prove that is not so, and I am going to discuss it for the RECORD before the day is over.

Mr. SMOOT. They do not say 8.8 per cent for the one little bank about which the Senator has occupied so much time, trying to discredit the Federal Reserve Board, a bank with $25,000 capital, lending six times the amount of its capital and—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to show there were scores of them. I have the report here.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi wants this letter read, I would be very glad to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be printed in the RECORD at the request of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the whole report printed in the RECORD, so people may know what the true situation is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it ought to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter of transmittal.

The reading clerk read the letter of transmittal, and the entire statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 17, 1923.

SIR: On December 7, 1922, the Federal Reserve Board received from the Secretary of the Senate a resolution (S. Res. 335) adopted December 6, 1922, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be requested to obtain from the Federal Reserve Banks of Atlanta, St. Louis, Dallas, and Kansas City statements showing all cases where interest ranging between 10 per cent and 87½ per cent per annum, both inclusive, was exacted from member banks, giving names of the banks, their capital and surplus, and location where 10 per cent per annum or more was charged on loans and rediscounts, the rate and amount of interest charged in each instance as expressed in dollars and cents; also a statement showing whether the Federal reserve banks have refunded to each member bank from which such exactions were made the amount of such interest collected in excess of 10 per cent per annum upon each loan upon which such interest was charged."

In view of the fact that progressive rates were assessed against average borrowings in excess of the basic line determined in the manner outlined in Appendix A, attached to this reply, by the Federal Reserve Banks of Atlanta, St. Louis, and Dallas, and not against each individual loan, and that the same result was obtained by the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank by adjustments and rebates currently made, it would have been possible to have interpreted the resolution as applying only to those banks which were charged interest at the rate of 10 per cent or more on total borrowings during any period in which progressive rates were assessed. If this had been done, the report of the board would have covered only 5 banks in the Atlanta district, 5 in the St. Louis district, none in the Dallas district, and 16 in the Kansas City district. The board felt that such interpretation would not give the Senate the information desired, nor would it give a fair picture of the real effect which the progressive rates had on borrowings of member banks. Accordingly the resolution was interpreted to call for the additional discount charged member banks at progressive rates in each instance where the maximum point to which the rate progressed was 10 per cent or over. The report therefore covers 44 banks in the Atlanta district, 49 in the St. Louis district, 114 in the Kansas City district, and 20 in the Dallas district.

It should be understood, however, that the range of rates charged is merely a record of the mathematical steps used in the calculation of the amount of discount chargeable under the progressive-rate plan. It was somewhat similar to an interest table in that tables could have been used showing the average rate to be charged under each range of progressive rates. As stated in Appendix A to this letter, graduated rates were progressed at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent for each 25 per cent by which the amount of borrowings exceeded the basic line. In the calculation of the amount of discount chargeable, therefore, it was necessary to divide the excess borrowings into portions equivalent to 25 per cent of the basic discount line of the member bank and then to assess the superrates by successive steps, beginning with one-half of 1 per cent.

For example, if a certain member bank had a basic discount line of $100,000 and its total borrowings during a given month averaged $400,000, of which $100,000 was secured by Government obligations and exempt from the application of progressive rates, its excess borrowings subject to progressive rates would amount to $200,000, as indicated below:

Total borrowings, average during the month	$400,000
Deduct:
Basic discount line	$100,000
Paper secured by Government obligations and exempt from the application of progressive rates	100,000
	200,000
Excess borrowings subject to progressive rates	200,000

Progressive rates increasing at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent for each $25,000—25 per cent of basic line—by which the borrowings subject to progressive rates exceeded the basic line would have been assessed against the $200,000 as follows:

$25,000 for one month at one-half per cent	$10.42
$25,000 for one month at 1 per cent	20.83
$25,000 for one month at 1½ per cent	31.25
$25,000 for one month at 2 per cent	41.67
$25,000 for one month at 2½ per cent	52.08
$25,000 for one month at 3 per cent	62.50
$25,000 for one month at 3½ per cent	72.92
$25,000 for one month at 4 per cent	83.33
Total ($200,000)	375.00

In this particular case the member bank would have been charged $375 on its excess borrowings of $200,000 for one month—in addition to the discount charged at the basic rate—and this would represent an interest charge of 2½ per cent on the excess borrowings of $200,000, or of 1½ per cent on total borrowings. As explained below, this would have represented an interest charge on total borrowings of 6½ per cent.

It will readily be seen from the above example that the rate which is most significant, inasmuch as it measures the extent of the penalty imposed on the member bank under the progressive-rate plan, is the one which, when applied to the total amount of excess borrowings, yields the amount of interest charged to the member bank. In the case just described this rate is 2½ per cent and not 4 per cent. The total rate chargeable on excess borrowings in the above example would be 8 per cent, or the basic rate, which may be assumed to be 5½ per cent, plus the average superrate of 2½ per cent on excess borrowings. This calculation should be carried one step further in order to determine the average rate such a bank would be paying on its total borrowings at the reserve bank, which we find to be 5½ per cent plus 1½ per cent, or 7 per cent, at a time when the bank was borrowing altogether an amount equal to four times its basic line.

It may be well at this point to call attention to the fact that while there has been considerable criticism of the progressive rates as applied by the four Federal reserve banks, most of the criticism has come from sources other than the banks which paid these progressive rates. In fact, as shown on pages 47-48 of part 22 of hearings before the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank received resolutions from banks in a number of cities in its district requesting that the progressive rates be continued.

A careful examination of the statements inclosed herewith will show that very few of the banks paid an average rate—normal rate plus superrate—on total borrowing as high as 10 per cent in any period during which progressive rates were assessed, even before rebates were made of interest charged in excess of 12 per cent by the Atlanta and Kansas City Federal Reserve Banks. In the case of the Dallas Reserve Bank the maximum average rate charged on total borrowings did not reach 8 per cent except in the case of one bank, and in that instance it only reached 8½ per cent. When it is taken into consideration that the average rate charged by member banks to customers in this district, especially in the smaller towns, was from 8 to 10 per cent, it will be readily seen that the adoption of the progressive rates, though it may have reduced materially the profits of the borrowing member banks, did not penalize them in the sense of making them pay more for accommodation at the Federal reserve bank than they were charging their customers. Even in the much-quoted case of the bank in the Atlanta district which paid a maximum rate of 87½ per cent on a small portion of its excess borrowings during the two-week period ending September 30, 1920, we find that that bank was charged only 13.37 per cent on total borrowings during the period from June to November when it was assessed progressive rates and only 8.8 per cent after charges in excess of 12 per cent were rebated.

One reason for the high progressive rates in the Kansas City district was that as they were applied to current borrowings at the time paper was offered for discount, and the rate of progression began at a point determined by the amount of the bank's borrowings in excess of the basic line, including the current offerings, the minimum rate applicable was frequently materially above the basic rate. These rates were charged, however, with the distinct understanding that the excess in the amount of interest charged over what would have been charged had progressive rates been applied to daily excess borrowings instead of to current offerings would be subsequently rebated.

The resolution requests the Federal Reserve Board to give the Senate the name, capital and surplus, and location of each bank which paid interest at progressive rates ranging from 10 to 87½ per cent per annum, together with the rates paid and amount of interest charged in each case. While the board desires to comply with the resolution in its entirety, it does not feel at liberty to divulge the names of member banks which were charged interest at progressive rates. Many of the member banks in these four districts, which were borrowing excessive amounts from the Federal reserve banks and consequently paying progressive rates, were in a very overextended condition, and if the name of any particular bank were made public in this connection it might create doubt in the minds of some of the bank's customers as to its soundness and as to the judgment and ability of those responsible for its management. Some of the bank's depositors might withdraw their accounts in the belief that it is not safe to leave their funds on deposit with an institution which had been permitted to get into an extremely overextended and perhaps unsafe condition. In the statements submitted herewith the names and locations of individual member banks have, therefore, been omitted.

In adopting the policy of charging progressive rates, the Federal reserve banks were guided by the fundamental principle that each member bank is entitled to accommodation in proportion to its contribution to the lending power of the Federal reserve banks, consisting of its lawful reserve on deposit with the Federal reserve bank and its quota of the paid-in capital stock. It was this contribution to the Federal reserve bank's lending power which was used in determining the normal or basic discount line, except in the case of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, where the capital and surplus of the borrowing member banks was used as the basic line. This was done for the reason that the directors of the Dallas bank, after careful analysis, felt that this method of determining the basic line was more satisfactory, especially in the case of the smaller banks. The principle of the basic line is recognized in section 4 of the Federal reserve act, which provides that the board of directors of each Federal reserve bank shall, "subject to the provisions of law and the orders of the Federal Reserve Board, extend to each member bank such discounts, advances, and accommodations as may be safely and reasonably made with due regard for the claims and demands of other member banks." The authority for charging progressive rates is contained in section 14 of the act, which provides that discount rates, "subject to the approval, review, and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, may be graduated or progressed on the basis of the amount of the advances and discount accommodations extended by the Federal reserve bank to the borrowing bank." The method of arriving at the basic discount line in each of the four districts was determined by the boards of directors and is fully explained in Appendix A.

While the details of operation of the progressive rate scheme were somewhat different in each of the four Federal reserve districts in which it was put into effect, the board has endeavored to present the figures for all four districts in as uniform a manner as practicable, in order that the data may be as nearly on a comparable basis as the different methods of application will permit. But it has been necessary to use three slightly different forms of presentation, one for the Federal reserve districts of St. Louis and Dallas, another for the Kansas City district, and a third for the Atlanta district. In examining these statements it should be borne in mind that the object has been to show the additional discount charged at rates above normal, i. e., the penalty which was assessed against each member bank on account of its obtaining accommodation in an amount greatly in excess of its equitable proportion of the lending power of the Federal reserve bank.

Amounts shown in the columns "Additional discount charged at superrates" therefore do not include—and this is explained in the note at the bottom of each statement—the discount charged at normal or basic rates which the bank would have been required to pay had no progressive rates been in effect. Likewise, the rates shown in the tables are stated exclusive of the normal discount rate in order to enable one to get a clear picture of the penalty rate assessed. If it is desired to obtain the average rate applied to borrowings in excess of the basic line, or to total borrowings, it will be necessary to add the normal rate in effect to the superrates shown. For instance, member bank No. 1 in the Kansas City statement was charged in May, 1920, a superrate on excess borrowings, before adjustments and rebates, of 2.46 per cent, and on total borrowings of 1.12 per cent. These rates when added to the normal rate of 6 per cent—applicable to all paper not secured by United States Government obligations—bring the total rates charged up to 8.46 and 7.12 per cent, respectively. The rates shown in the column headed "Range of superrates" are also the penalty rates charged and must therefore be combined with the normal rate to get the total rate charged. Therefore, in cases where the penalty or superrates ranged from one-half to 4 per cent, the total rate charged on borrowings in excess of the basic line ranged from 6½ to 10 per cent.

The normal rate in the four districts which applied progressive rates was 6 per cent on all paper except that secured by United States Government obligations. Such paper was accorded preferential rates, with a minimum of 5 per cent, during the period in which progressive rates were in effect. In the Atlanta and Dallas Federal reserve districts rates on paper secured by Liberty bonds and Victory notes remained at 5½ per cent during the entire period in which progressive rates were in effect. In the St. Louis and Kansas City districts the rates were increased from 5½ per cent to 6 per cent on May 21, 1921, and September 28, 1920, respectively. When progressive rates were established, rates on paper secured by Treasury certificates of indebtedness were 5 to 5½ per cent in each of the districts except Kansas City, where a uniform rate of 5 per cent was in force. While the minimum rate remained unchanged in the Atlanta and Dallas districts, the maximum rate was increased to 6 per cent on July 2, 1920, by Atlanta, and on July 13, 1920, by Dallas. The discount rate actually chargeable on such paper corresponded with the rate borne by the securities pledged as collateral within the minimum and maximum limits stated above. In the case of the St. Louis district on January 22, 1921, a flat rate of 6 per cent was substituted. The Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank increased its maximum to 6 per cent on July 3, 1920, and on July 1, 1921, adopted a uniform 6 per cent rate on all classes of paper.

In view of these preferential rates on paper secured by Government obligations the average normal or basic rate charged in these districts was somewhat below the 6 per cent rate on commercial and agricultural paper in effect and averaged around 5½ per cent.

The Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank applied the progressive rates to paper at the time it was offered for discount, and in accordance with its previously announced policy made current daily adjustments in the amount of discount charged on excess borrowings as paper matured and was paid. The borrowing member bank knew, therefore, that the progressive rates originally applied were only tentative, and that after adjustments and rebates they would be charged progressive rates only on their actual borrowings in excess of their basic line. This plan of operation, however, made it necessary, in order to present a complete picture, to show in the exhibit for the Kansas City bank the amounts charged member banks at superrates, both before and after adjustments and rebates. In both the Kansas City and Atlanta district rates of interest charged certain member banks progressed to exceptionally high levels, largely because of the fact that these member banks allowed their reserve balances—which entered into the determination of the basic line—to fall far below legal requirements. In view of the high rates these two Federal reserve banks requested and obtained permission from the Federal Reserve Board to rebate all discount charged in excess of 12 per cent. In the case of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank the amount of discount charged at superrates both before and after these rebates is shown, while in the case of the Kansas City bank these rebates have been included with the rebates arising from current adjustments explained above.

As brought out in Governor Harding's testimony before the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, and in the report of that commission, the situation in some of the Federal reserve districts early in 1920 was such that a relatively small number of banks were borrowing excessively from the Federal reserve banks, while other member banks were borrowing little or nothing. At that time the reserve percentage of the Federal reserve banks was approaching the legal minimum provided in the Federal reserve act, and it was therefore felt that, if member banks which were not borrowing should apply for such advancements and accommodations from the Federal reserve banks as they were entitled to receive, the Federal reserve banks would soon find themselves in a position where the reserve requirements provided in the Federal reserve act would have to be suspended. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks concerned felt that there should be a more even distribution of accommodation extended to member banks, and four Federal reserve banks—Atlanta, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Dallas—requested and obtained approval of the Federal Reserve Board to establish progressive rates which would have the effect of restraining borrowings on the part of banks in an overextended condition. It was thought that this would discourage such member banks from making further loans and that consequently any demands for additional credit would come largely from banks which were not in an overextended condition.

As a matter of fact, this is about what happened, as may be seen from the following quotation taken from pages 56-58 of part 2 of the Report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, which relates to loans in the Kansas City district:

"In January, 1920, 14 banks in Kansas City had absorbed 34 per cent of the normal lending power of the Federal reserve bank and 9 Omaha banks had absorbed 23.5 per cent. Therefore these two cities alone had absorbed 57 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank. There was a slight recession in the borrowings of these banks due to temporary seasonal deflation in the early part of 1920, but by April, 1920, the 14 Kansas City banks were absorbing 50 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank and 9 Omaha banks were absorbing 23 per cent, representing a total of 73 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, and leaving only 27 per cent of the normal lending power available for the 1,063 other member banks in the Kansas City district.

"In the period from April 19, 1920, to December 31, 1920, banks which had not been previously borrowing increased their borrowings to 12 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank. During the same period the number of banks borrowing in the Kansas City Federal reserve district increased from 178, or 16.8 per cent of all the banks, to 416, or 38.3 per cent of all the banks. In the same period the amount borrowed by all borrowing banks increased from $106,851,047 to $117,328,475. While banks not borrowing previously to April 19, 1920, when the progressive rate became effective, were increasing their borrowings, the borrowings of the 14 Kansas City member banks paying the progressive rate decreased to 36 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, and the borrowings of the 9 Omaha member banks paying the progressive rate decreased to 13 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank.

"One effect of the adoption of the progressive rate in the Kansas City Federal reserve district, therefore, apparently was to compel a reduction in the proportion of the lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, which was being absorbed by the large city banks in Kansas City and Omaha, and to permit the use of that lending power in meeting the requirements of banks which were previously not borrowing or borrowing only moderately."

In examining borrowings of member banks in the larger cities, such as New York, Chicago, and Boston, we find that no member bank in any one of these cities at any time borrowed from the Federal reserve banks an amount in excess of two and one-half times its basic line. Consequently, had the progressive rates been in effect in these districts without exemption of paper secured by United States Government obligations, no member bank, with one exception, in any of these cities would have at any time paid an average rate on total borrowings as high as 7 per cent, and in the case of this one exception the average rate would have been less than 7.05 per cent. In this case, however, the bank's entire borrowings were secured by obligations of the United States Government.

It is clear, therefore, that every member bank in these big cities, borrowing at the 7 per cent commercial paper rate, whether or not borrowing in excess of its basic line, paid a higher rate of discount than it would have been required to pay had the Federal reserve banks in those cities adopted a 6 per cent rate on commercial loans with progressive rates such as were in effect in the Atlanta, Kansas City, St. Louis, and Dallas districts. This statement is based upon the assumption that no loans to these banks in excess of their basic lines would have been excepted from the application of progressive rates; as a matter of fact, as is shown in Appendix A, most of the paper secured by obligations of the United States Government was exempted from the application of progressive rates in all districts. In the case of the Atlanta district, paper drawn for strictly agricultural production up to 100 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus was also excepted from the application of progressive rates.

From an examination of the statements inclosed herewith it will be noted that the average superrate—excess over normal rate—if applied to total borrowings, very rarely exceeded a reasonable penalty charge, even in the case of those banks which were in a highly overextended condition. In the case of the bank in the Atlanta district which was charged superrates reaching in one instance as high as 8 1/2 per cent, it appears that during that particular two-week period the average superrate applied to total borrowings was 27.44 per cent before the Federal reserve bank rebated all discount charged in excess of 12 per cent, and 3.88 per cent after such rebate was made.

With regard to this bank, the following is quoted from a letter received from the chairman of the board of directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, printed on page 318 of part 13 of the hearings before the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry:

"Taking the matter as a whole, however, from the statement submitted below, it can be seen that while the progressive rates seem exorbitant the average rates paid to us for money borrowed during this period, when applied against the average borrowings, will not show anything in comparison to the seemingly high progressive rates shown. For instance, the average borrowings of the National Bank for the period from June 15, 1920, to October 15, 1920, was $149,830. The normal discount rate at 6 per cent on this amount would be $2,996.60. Add to this amount progressive discount rates charged, $3,680.15, and this less progressive discount rates rebated, $2,281.56, would leave net amount of interest paid $4,395.19, which would result in a rate charged for the average borrowing of 8.80032 per cent per annum."

At the time the high progressive rate was charged this bank it was borrowing from the Federal reserve bank an amount equal to almost seven times its own capital stock, and at the same time had allowed its reserve balance to fall so much below legal requirements—from $9,433 to $80—that its basic discount line, which is based upon the amount of its contribution in the form of capital stock subscription and reserve balance, was less than one-sixth of what it would have been had its reserves been maintained in accordance with the Federal reserve act. This failure to maintain reserves as required by law resulted in the bank's having a very low basic line and consequently the ratio of its borrowings to its basic line rose very rapidly. Had the bank maintained the reserve required by law the maximum rate charged would have been 17 per cent, and the average rate on total borrowings, even before rebates were made, would have been 9.19 per cent during this semi-monthly period.

At the time the Federal Reserve Board authorized the Federal reserve banks to establish progressive rates it was not expected that any member bank would permit its lawful reserve balance to decline almost to the vanishing point, especially at a time when it was in a so badly overextended condition as to necessitate borrowings from the Federal reserve bank in an amount equal to several times its own capital and surplus. The Federal Reserve Board did not approve of excessive rates, and as soon as it became apparent that the progressive-rate plan in effect was in some instances resulting in unreasonable rates immediate consideration was given, both by the board and the Federal reserve bank, to devising some plan whereby such results could be obviated. As a matter of fact, the high rate of 8 1/2 per cent was charged in the two-week period ending September 30, 1920, and reports of these transactions were received by the board some time during October, and on November 1 the progressive rates in the Atlanta district were abolished and that bank substituted in lieu thereof a flat commercial rate of 7 per cent, which was in effect also at the Federal Reserve Banks of Boston, New York, Chicago, and Minneapolis.

It is a noteworthy fact that the excessively high rates charged in the Atlanta and Kansas City districts in certain instances were, as in the case discussed above, due primarily to the effect upon the member bank's basic discount line of its failure to maintain its legally required reserve balances with the Federal reserve bank. In the case of St. Louis and Dallas the member bank's basic-discount line, in consequence of the method by which it was determined, was in nowise affected by failure to maintain its reserves, and accordingly in these two districts the rates charged did not reach excessive levels and no rebates were made, as was done in the Atlanta and Kansas City districts, where all interest charged in excess of 12 per cent per annum was subsequently rebated. These rebates amounted to $9,108.66 in the Atlanta district and to less than $300 in the Kansas City district.

As an illustration of the relationship between discount rates charged by the four Federal reserve banks which adopted the progressive rate plan and the rates charged by the other banks, there are shown below the average rates—including discount at progressive rates—charged by each Federal reserve bank during 1920 and 1921:

Federal reserve bank.	1920	1921
Boston.....	6.03	5.88
New York.....	5.97	6.06
Philadelphia.....	5.44	5.44
Cleveland.....	5.66	5.72
Richmond.....	5.78	5.91
Atlanta.....	5.97	6.05
Chicago.....	6.32	6.29
St. Louis.....	5.98	5.90
Minneapolis.....	6.40	6.35
Kansas City.....	6.65	6.14
Dallas.....	5.78	6.01
San Francisco.....	5.82	5.79
Total.....	6.02	6.01

It will be seen from the above that during 1920 the average rate charged by New York was higher than that charged by Dallas, the same as that charged by Atlanta, one one-hundredth of 1 per cent less than that charged by St. Louis, and sixty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent lower than that charged by Kansas City. In 1921 the average rate charged by New York was higher than that charged in Atlanta, St. Louis, and Dallas, and only eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent lower than that charged by Kansas City.

Respectfully submitted,

EDMUND PLATT, Acting Governor.

The President of the Senate.

APPENDIX A.

DESCRIPTION OF PROGRESSIVE RATE PLANS IN EFFECT IN THE ATLANTA, ST. LOUIS, KANSAS CITY, AND DALLAS FEDERAL RESERVE DISTRICTS. [Copied from pamphlet on Discount Rates of the Federal Reserve Banks, 1914-1921.]

ATLANTA.

Date effective: May 31, 1920.

Basic line: Sixty-five per cent of reserve balance plus paid-in subscription to capital stock of Federal reserve bank—average for previous reserve computation period, weekly for reserve city banks and semi-monthly for country banks—multiplied by two and one-half.

When applied: Normal rate at time of discount. Superrate applied at end of reserve computation period to average borrowings in excess of basic line.

Scale of rates: Superrate of one-half of 1 per cent for the first 25 per cent or fraction thereof by which borrowings exceed basic line, 1 per cent for second 25 per cent excess, etc.

Exceptions: Member bank collateral notes secured by Liberty bonds or Victory notes actually owned by the borrowing bank on April 1, 1920, or by Treasury certificates actually owned were subject only to normal discount rates, but were considered a part of the total borrowings or "credit structure" in determining the progressive rate applicable to other eligible paper.

Rebates on paper paid before maturity: At normal rate.

Modifications: On June 14, 1920, after approval by the Federal Reserve Board, paper drawn for strictly agricultural production up to 100 per cent of the member bank's capital and surplus was excepted from application of progressive rates.

On June 23, 1921, Federal Reserve Board approved recommendation that all charges previously made in excess of 12 per cent, including the normal rate, be rebated.

Date discontinued: November 1, 1920.

ST. LOUIS.

Date effective: May 26, 1920.

Basic line: Same as Atlanta, except that reserve balances required during reserve computation periods covered by borrowings were used in determining the basic line.

When applied: Same as Atlanta.

Scale of rates: Same as Atlanta.

Exceptions: Member bank collateral notes secured by Liberty bonds or Victory notes actually owned by the borrowing bank on April 1, 1920, or by Treasury certificates actually owned were not considered part of the total borrowings or "credit structure" nor did progressive rates apply thereto.

Rebates on paper paid before maturity: At normal rate.

Modifications: On May 21, 1921, progressive rate plan was modified to provide a rate of 1 per cent in excess of the normal rate of 6 per cent on all borrowings in excess of the basic discount line, subject to exemption previously in effect.

Date discontinued: June 23, 1921.

KANSAS CITY.

Date effective: April 19, 1920.

Basic line: Same as Atlanta, except that the reserve balance used in determining the basic line was the average maintained during the reserve computation periods ending with the preceding month.

When applied: At time of discount, subject to adjustments to compensate reductions in borrowings and increased or decreased basic line determined from month to month by the formula outlined above.

Scale of rates: Same as Atlanta.

Exceptions: Member banks' collateral notes, secured by Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Liberty bonds, or Victory notes owned by the borrowing member bank on April 1, 1920, were exempted from the application of superrates but were considered part of the "credit structure" or total borrowings in fixing the rates applicable to other paper; while all rediscounts secured by Government war obligations, as well as member banks' collateral notes not described above, were subject to the application of the superrates as well as being considered part of the "credit structure."

Rebates on paper paid before maturity: At rate charged.

Modifications: On April 27, 1920, modified the progressive rate plan by excluding member banks' collateral notes secured by Liberty bonds or Victory notes actually owned on April 1, 1920, or by Treasury certificates of indebtedness actually owned altogether from the application of progressive rates; i. e., they were not only not subject to progressive discount rates but were not to be taken into consideration in determining the progressive rates applicable to other eligible paper; while rediscounts secured by Government war obligations, though no longer subject to the application of superrates, were still considered part of the "credit structure" or aggregate indebtedness in determining superrates applicable to other eligible paper.

On January 29, 1921, established a maximum rate, including the normal rate, of 12 per cent.

On July 1, 1921, established a maximum rate of 8 per cent, including the normal rate of 6 per cent, and at the same time changed the scale of progression to 1 per cent for the first 100 per cent of borrowings in excess of the basic line and to 2 per cent on any further borrowings. Beginning July 1 member bank collateral notes secured by Government war obligations, while subject only to normal discount rates, were again considered a part of the "credit structure" for the purpose of determining the progressive rate applicable to other eligible paper.

On August 3, 1921, Federal Reserve Board approved recommendation that all charges previously made in excess of 12 per cent, including the normal rate, be rebated.

Date discontinued: August 1, 1921.

DALLAS.

Date effective: May 21, 1920.

Basic line: Paid-up and unimpaired capital and surplus of borrowing bank.

When applied: At time of discount. (See modifications.)

Scale of rates: Same as Atlanta.

Exceptions: Same as St. Louis.

Rebates on paper paid before maturity: At current discount rates.

Modifications: On July 7, 1920, discontinued application of progressive rates to current offerings and thereafter based them upon average excess borrowings within a reserve computation period. At this time all charges previously made were rebated and in lieu thereof new charges were imposed in accordance with the modified scheme.

Date discontinued: February 15, 1921.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I am about to make shall be printed in the Record immediately following the report of the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Platt, which was read this morning to the Senate. I wish my statement, together with some figures I am going to submit, to follow in the Record the matter to which I have referred, and I ask permission that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDELL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I gather from the reading of the report that the contention is made that the banks which were charged high interest rates did not complain. I have pointed out here time and time again that those banks were intimidated; they were frightened by the Federal Reserve Board's policy; and, of course, they did not complain to the Federal Reserve Board. They had their heads in the lion's mouth; they wanted to get them out in the easiest way possible. I have mentioned the fact a number of times, as have other Senators, that bankers have written to me, as they have written to other Senators, complaining of the conduct of the Federal Reserve Board, but asking us not to use their names. Mr. President, it was a coercive, intimidating, tyrannical process that was employed against these banks in the agricultural sections. That is why they did not protest to the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board had the power to destroy their business, and they were trying to get along as best they could and not incur any more than possible the displeasure of the Federal Reserve Board.

I have not had time to examine the report of the Federal Reserve Board sent in response to my resolution which was passed by the Senate. I fear that it does not give all the information asked for. I notified the acting governor of the Federal Reserve Board that I wanted the specific interest rate charged in each instance, but it seems that they have gone and juggled the figures, and tried to cover up the high interest rates by citing the average rate which they charged. I specifically pointed out in my letter to the board that that was not what I wanted. But, even at that, Mr. President, the report discloses the facts along this line to substantiate every charge I have made.

I gather from the report which was read here this morning that they did not wish to give the names of the banks which they had thus mistreated—they were mistreated, that is the literal truth—the board did not want to give the names of the banks that they had thus mistreated because it might cause the depositors to withdraw their deposits. Mr. President, I submit to the Senate and the country that is a confession upon the part of the Federal Reserve Board that it so humiliated and oppressed these banks, that they reduced them to such a state of weakness during this time by high interest rates that it would be a disturbing element in the community if that fact were disclosed. I put against that statement the fact that these banks, every one of them, in spite of the high interest rates which were charged, survived, and not one of them failed. If that is true, it shows that there was no necessity in the outset to apply the high interest rates to these struggling little banks. If they could survive and come through that terrible time even with the heavy burden upon them of a progressive interest rate, reaching up to 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, and as high as 87½ per cent, it shows that there is no excuse under heaven for applying any such rate.

A suggestion is made that it was necessary to apply this progressive interest rate because of the basic credit line being overstepped and the gold reserve being threatened. That is not so. John Skelton Williams was Comptroller of the Currency at that time, and he stated that, instead of the Federal Reserve Board deflating credits and contracting currency, they could put into circulation $2,000,000,000 more. Nobody has denied that; they can not deny it; it is the truth. If it is the truth, then through every dollar that they took out of circulation, through every loan they denied, and through every credit which was deflated they committed a crime against the legitimate business of the people of the United States.

I desire to call attention to what William P. G. Harding said in his report of 1920. He said in substance:

The Federal reserve system has taken care of the business of the United States in the greatest war that ever existed. It has not only done that but it has financed the World War, and done it without ever having recourse to the gold reserve of the system.

Now, I want Senators to get this point:

It is capable of expanding still more without having recourse to the gold reserve, and very much more by having recourse to the gold reserve.

Mr. President, if that is true—and it is true; I know that it is true; every Senator who has studied the question knows that it is true—what excuse was there for deflation? None under the sun. What did we create the system for? To prevent just such a situation as was produced by the maladministration of the system. We boasted—I have, amongst others—that it was panic proof; that we would never see another panic under the operation of the Federal reserve banking system; that it was so constructed, with 12 regional banks, that they could mobilize the credits of the Nation in such a fashion as to meet every emergency; that we never would hear of another panic.

In proof of that contention I submit what it did during the World War. It provided the funds to conduct the war, the greatest war that ever cursed the world, and during that time it financed every business in the United States, including agriculture. There was not a ripple or a sign upon the surface of a panic anywhere until Wall Street bondholders, speculators, and big financiers, with Republican leaders, willed that we have a panic; and when they willed it they took charge of this governor of the Federal Reserve Board, a very willing subject, and he carried out their policy for them, was in collusion with them, and they operated upon the South and upon the West and bond values went down and down; fell from $100 on the 100 to $85, to $82.50, and $80, and these bond sharks of New York bought them up by the thousands and hundreds of thousands, and made $200,000,000 out of the bonds they bought in the South alone.

That is what happened. They did the same thing in the West. Agricultural values tumbled down by the billions, and agricultural products were sold far below the cost of production. Loans were called, mortgages were foreclosed, and business distress and financial ruin followed in the wake of the deflation policy thus brutally conducted. Now this board, still undertaking to defend their gruesome, murderous policy, say that they had to employ the progressive interest rate. I ask, if they had to employ it, why did they not employ it in the East? Why did they not employ it in the North? Why employ it in the agricultural sections of the South and West? That is unfair, manifestly unfair. Any fair-minded man or woman in the country will say that it is unfair, but the board undertakes to defend it. Now they say that the eastern banks, the New York banks, never stepped over "the basic line of their credit."

Why, Mr. President, they got all the money they wanted. They were speculating on the bear side of cotton and grain.

They were buying bonds as deflation beat down the price. They were turning their money over rapidly. New York made more money during that period than it has ever made in a similar period in its history. Why did they need credits? Why should the man worry who went out and bought Liberty bonds at $85 on the hundred, making $15 on the hundred, clipping the coupons here at the Treasury as the interest came due? Why should the man worry who sold cotton on the future exchange at 40 cents a pound and saw it go down to 30, making $50 on the bale? It was going his way. It made money for him while he slept. Then, when it went on down to 20 cents, he had made a hundred dollars a bale, and when it went to 10 cents he had made $150 a bale; and the man who had sold 10,000 bales on the exchange at 40 cents when it went down to 10 cents took down more than a million dollars. Why did he need any loan? The deflation policy was putting money in his pocket every second, every minute, every hour, every day, every night, every week, every month during that awful time, until he had made $150 a bale. Then, when he got that million dollars, he sold some more and bought more bonds.

Why, New York had a perfect feast during that time; and yet the acting governor of the board undertakes to tell the Senate and the country that New York "did not overstep her basic line of credit." Certainly not. Governor Harding did not apply the progressive interest rate up there, but he applied it in the South and the West. When W. P. G. Harding told the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that he never intended to apply this progressive interest rate to the agricultural sections, but that he only wanted it so that he could apply it to New York, what did he tell when he told Senator SMITH that? He never did apply it to New York. That is not the first time we have contradicted him and proven him guilty of deception—not the first time, by any means. He never did apply it to New York. He never applied it to the East anywhere. He never applied it to the North anywhere. He never applied it to New England. It has developed that he is the pet of the big interests of New England.

Observe what happened recently with him. When he was driven off the Federal Reserve Board, when it was impossible to confirm him in the Senate if his name had been sent here, New England took him in her loving arms. The cotton manufacturers of New England had already indorsed his deflation policy when the spinners of New England were buying cotton at 10 cents a pound that cost the people of Alabama and other Southern States 30 cents a pound to produce. They were laughing in their sleeves up there, and patting him on the back, and saying: "Hurrah for Governor Harding!" And when the final die was cast, and the Rubicon was crossed and its crimson waters were rippling sportively behind him, and he was absolutely out, they said: "Come to us; we will take care of you," and they made him governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston.

Oh, Mr. President, these things, these big developments along the way just simply prove every charge that I have made on the floor of the Senate. I said there was a ring of these people and a deflation conspiracy at the bottom of it, and that they had already agreed to take care of him. I said: "When he goes out of the Federal Reserve Board, as he will, they will put him in another position and keep him in connection with the system if they can." Now they have got him at the head of the Boston Federal Reserve Bank, the regional bank up there, at a salary of $25,000 a year. They do not want to lose him.

He is as cold-blooded as a fish, and as cunning and cruel as a fox. He is just the sort of man they want in the service.

There are men in Wall Street to-day who have made their millions and hundreds of millions because of him and his operations. They wanted to see him taken care of and kept in the system, and now they have got him as governor of one of these 12 banks—the first man in the history of the Federal reserve system who perverted it from the ends of its institution, maladministered it, caused men to go insane, drove others into their graves, having killed themselves by their own hands under his administration as governor of the Federal Reserve Board during the last two years of his reign. Of course, New York did not "overstep her basic line of credit." While they were applying to my State 10, 15, 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, 87½ per cent, New York was getting money at 5 per cent, and never paid over 6 per cent.

As to the evasive report which was sent in by the Federal Reserve Board, I wish to say that I sent a copy to John Skelton Williams, of Richmond, Va., and requested him to make any comment that he felt like making. As has been said of him by other Senators on this floor, he was the best Comptroller of the Currency that we had had in 40 years—a man of rigid integrity, a man of wonderfully brilliant intellect; and as I have said before, a man as courageous as Julius Caesar, and as honest as Paul; a man who has the right conception of his duty as a public servant; a man who believes that public office is a public trust; a man who believes with Jefferson that the whole art of government consists in the art of being honest; a man who believes in fair play and justice all the time. He was Comptroller of the Currency when they applied this progressive interest rate. He protested against it. He offered a resolution in the Federal Reserve Board to hold them down to 6 per cent, and not exceeding 10 per cent in any instance. They voted him down, under the direction of Governor Harding of the board. Then what happened? They got to having secret meetings without notifying John Skelton Williams, a member of the board, that they were going to meet.

That proves that this conspiracy of which I have spoken existed. They did not want him present. They did not want him to know what was happening; but he got onto it, and after he found that they were having these secret meetings and were not notifying him, he wrote a letter to the governor of the board and got an answer from him, enough to show the bent of Governor Harding's mind and enough for John Skelton Williams to lay the foundation and open the way for the fight that has been going on here for 18 months and more. The fight that I have made on the floor of the Senate has been based to a large extent upon the indisputable facts given me from time to time by John Skelton Williams, who, because of his position as Comptroller of the Currency and member at that time of the Federal Reserve Board, knew the truth and, thank God, he dared to tell it. He has been criticized and slandered, just as I have.

I want to call to the attention of the Senate now what he says about these rates. Let us see whether they are 8 per cent or not. In his letter to me this morning he says: "I call your attention to the following:

"Member bank No. 1 is evidently the little bank at Abbeville, a bank in south Alabama. There they admit the following: From July 1 to July 15 that little bank was charged 6½ to 18½ per cent on $72,657. Between January 16 and 31 it was charged 6½ to 31 per cent on $88,419. Between August 16 and September 15, 1920, the bank was charged 6½ to 19½ per cent on over $102,000. Between September 16 and 30 they were charged 6½ to 87½ per cent on $112,446; and during the succeeding two weeks—October 1 to 15—6½ to 21 per cent per annum was exacted on $87,818."

That tears to tatters the report to which attention was called this morning by the Senator from Utah.

"In the Atlanta district, bank No. 10 was charged 6½ to 16½ per cent on $67,765 from October 16 to 30, 1920. From bank No. 12 in the Atlanta district they confess to exacting, from July 1 to 15, interest from 14 to 16 per cent. From August 16 to 31 interest from 11½ to 19½ per cent was charged on $350,000."

September 1 to 15, interest from 18 per cent to 32½ per cent on $341,000. The same bank, from September 16 to 30, paid from 10 to 18½ per cent on $446,000. From October 1 to 15 the bank was required to pay from 9½ to 17½ per cent on $467,000. October 16 to 31 it was made to pay from 9 per cent to 19½ per cent on $522,000.

Bank No. 15 was made to pay from 6½ to 16 per cent from September 1 to 15 on $140,000; from October 1 to 15 it was made to pay from 6½ to 14½ per cent on $171,000; from October 16 to 30 they were made to pay from 6½ to 14½ per cent on $202,000.

From October 16 to 30 bank No. 16 was required to pay from 6½ to 15½ per cent on $222,000.

Bank No. 19 was required to pay from 6½ to 13½ per cent from October 16 to 30 on $28,000.

Mr. President, I am calling attention to these figures for the purpose of showing that right in the very heart of the crop-moving season these farmers were forced to dump their cotton upon the market; but if they had obtained the loans they had formerly gotten they would have kept it off the market and, instead of going down, the price would have remained up, and they could have paid their debts and closed their accounts for the year.

Bank No. 23 was required to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 13 per cent on \$66,000. From October 16 to 31 it was made to pay on \$79,000 from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 22 per cent.

What becomes of the 8 per cent and $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent talked about by the Senator from Utah this morning?

Bank No. 25 was forced to pay from 18 to 55 per cent from June 16 to 30, 1920, on \$162,000, and from July 1 to 15 it was made to pay on \$142,000 from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 20 per cent.

Bank No. 26 was made to pay from September 16 to 30, 1920, in the cotton-moving season, from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 15 per cent on \$27,000.

Bank No. 28 was required to pay from October 1 to 15, 1920, from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $11\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$1,960,000. From October 16 to 30 the same bank was forced to pay on \$2,174,000 interest at the rate of $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum.

Bank No. 32 needed $536,000 from May 28 to June 3, 1920, and the reserve bank forced them to pay for the accommodation from 11 to 15 per cent per annum.

All this time, Mr. President, the speculators of New York, the bond sharks of New York, the big financiers of New York, were getting all the money they needed at 5 per cent.

The same bank needed further funds from June 4 to 10, and was accommodated at the rate of from $9\frac{1}{2}$ to $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$531,000.

In other words, when one of these banks in the agricultural region, struggling to carry its customers and to tide them over the awful time that was upon them, needed a little more money the progressive interest rate was applied, and the more money they got the higher the rate of interest. Not so in New York. The interest rate remained the same whether the amount they got was little or large—5 per cent.

That bank had occasion to borrow again between August 13 and 19, and they were charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for the use of money for those six days, and for the succeeding week from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 13 per cent per annum was exacted.

Bank No. 35, also in the Atlanta district, which has a capital and surplus of \$2,300,000, needed funds for the protection of its customers from October 22 to 31, 1920, and the reserve bank accommodated them at the rate of from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 14 per cent, the amount borrowed being about \$3,500,000.

Bank No. 37, in the St. Louis district, tried to accommodate its customers and prevent failures by borrowing funds on good security from its reserve bank in the month of November, 1920, and was charged interest at the rate of from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 22 per cent on over \$275,000. For the month of December, 1920, the same bank was charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 20 per cent for the use of something over \$240,000. In January, 1921, the same bank was charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 23 per cent for the use of something over \$278,000. For February of the same year, when borrowings were about \$290,000, they were charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. For March, 1921, this reserve bank wrung from that same bank from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and from the 16th of April, 1921, to the 20th of May, 1921, the same bank was forced to pay $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 25 per cent for the use of about \$316,000.

Bank No. 41, St. Louis district, was forced to pay, from October 16 to 30, $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 84 per cent on \$143,000.

Bank No. 38 was made to pay, from October 1 to 15, $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 17 per cent on \$23,000. From October 16 to 30, on \$38,000 it was forced to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 21 per cent.

Bank No. 39 was made to pay from 6 to $15\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$127,000 from July 9 to 15, and from October 15 to 21 was made to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$163,000.

In the Kansas City district, bank No. 21, with a capital and surplus of \$27,500, was forced to pay for the month of November, 1920, interest at $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$13,880, and for the month of December, 1920, was required to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $21\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$9,123.

Bank No. 24, in the same district, was required to pay for the month of December, 1920, from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$342,000, and for the month of January it was made to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$347,000. For the period from February 1 to July 1, 1921, for \$279,000, it was made to pay from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum.

Bank No. 33, in the same district, was made to pay for the month of September, 1920, from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 16 per cent on \$44,000. In October, 1920, it was made to pay, on \$43,000, $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 16 per cent.

Bank No. 52 was forced to pay to its reserve bank for the month of June, 1920, for the use of \$149,000, from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and for the month of July it was required to pay for the use of \$242,000 from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

For the months of August, September, and October the same little bank was required to pay for the use of something like \$277,000 interest at the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 21 per cent. For the month of November the same bank was charged interest at the rate of from 9 to 21 per cent on \$243,000, and for the month of December, 1920, on loans of \$119,000 the interest extorted ranged from 11 to $21\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Bank No. 57, for the month of June, 1920, was forced to pay from $11\frac{1}{2}$ to 21 per cent for the use of \$23,000. For July, on borrowings of \$26,000, it was made to pay from 9 to 21 per cent; and for August, for the accommodation of \$24,000, it was made to pay from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 21 per cent.

Bank No. 80, with a capital and surplus of \$100,000, needed additional funds to help its customers in December, 1920, and the reserve bank accommodated it at rates ranging from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 18 per cent.

Bank No. 100, with a capital and surplus of \$150,000, needed accommodation in the month of January, 1921, and was loaned \$180,000 at $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. From February 1 to 25, on \$147,000, it was charged $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Bank No. 113, also in the Kansas City district, with $40,000 capital and surplus, was charged for the use of $20,000 from the 1st of February to the 25th of February, 1921, interest at from 11 to 19 per cent.

In the Dallas district I note that bank No. 4 was accommodated in September, 1920, with \$69,000 at from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 11 per cent, and from October, 1920, it was charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 11 per cent on \$75,000.

Bank No. 3, Dallas district, was charged on \$240,000 in December, 1920, $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 11 per cent.

Bank No. 1, in the same district, was charged from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent from November, 1920, on \$380,000. For the month of January, 1921, the same bank was charged $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on \$400,000, and February 1 to 14, 1921, on \$413,000 the reserve bank exacted $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest.

Bank No. 13, in the Dallas district, was accommodated for August, 1920, with \$278,000 at $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 13 per cent, and with \$305,000 in September at $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 13 per cent.

"These illustrations are sufficient to show you in a preliminary way the shameless exactions which have been made by reserve banks to member banks who were looking to them for protection and aid.

"I notice that Senator McLEAN has offered a resolution to appoint a committee to find out why more banks are not joining the Federal reserve system. No doubt one reason is the banks that have not joined have been told of the conscienceless rates which have been charged many member banks by their friends in the reserve system, and it may be they are not inclined to put themselves at the mercy of such friends.

"The Reserve Board knew well enough about February 2, 1921, that such wicked rates were being charged to member banks, but when I offered a resolution to limit interest rates to 6 per cent they quickly voted it down, and, as you know, they also voted down my subsequent resolution the same day, which sought to limit these rates to 10 per cent.

"Despite the claim so often made by the reserve officials that the cases where those excessive rates were charged were isolated and few and far between, I find from this list that they have sent you 44 of these victimized banks in the Atlanta district, 49 in the St. Louis district, 114 in the Kansas City district, and 20 in the Dallas district, or, say, 227 banks, for interest ranging all the way from 10 to $87\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum."

What becomes of the suggestion of the Senator from Utah and the juggled figures read about 8 and $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent?

"I notice that the amount of additional discount and super-rates extorted from one bank in Kansas City district—"

Listen, Senators—

"Amounted before adjustment and rebate to the respectable sum of $117,164, and after adjustment and rebate to the respectable sum of $50,675."

What becomes of the little $14 and some cents suggested by the Senator from Utah as being one of the amounts returned on high interest charged?

"Please note also that none of these illicit charges were disgorged or refunded until after you began to expose the whole wretched business and demanded that it be stopped."

That is the statement of the former Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams.

Mr. President, I wanted this statement to appear immediately following the report which the Senator from Utah had read into the RECORD this morning. I secured permission to have it appear following that report. I now ask that the figures and excerpts which I have read from the letter of Hon. John Skelton Williams may be printed in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this is the first glance I have had through the report. I have not yet had time to go through it carefully. But the first casual investigation of the report discloses that all through the Federal reserve districts of the South and West, as the banks were hard pressed to take care of their customers and to carry them through that awful period in 1920, the progressive interest rate was applied like a lash more and more as their wants increased. Not only were the interest rates applied to them to prevent them from getting loans, but the time came when the word went all over the South and West that the Federal Reserve Board did not want any more loans made on agricultural products. They tried to deny that. Governor Harding asked that somebody produce a written order. That is just like the burglar who has gone into somebody's house and then asks proof that he had told some one he was going into the house for burglarious purposes.

Of course, Governor Harding did not publish to the world those orders. They suggested in one of the Federal reserve bulletins that the word could best be suggested to the bankers through conversations, but one of the bulletins issued by the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, which was called to his attention during the hearings in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the Senate Office Building in December, 1920, said the thing to do was to bring about deflation as rapidly as possible. The board permitted that bulletin to be circulated.

I asked Governor Harding if he did not know that the cotton people of my State complained to him in October, 1920, that they were not getting loans on cotton, and he excitedly said that he remembered that certain bankers of Birmingham wanted him to let them hold cotton until it went back to 40 cents, "but," he said, "I would not do it." I had charged that he had the power to let us have loans to prevent the ruin of our business and that he would not do it.

Why did he not do it? It cost 30 cents a pound to produce that cotton crop. The farmer was entitled to 40 cents. He had planted his crop on the 40-cent basis. He had bought fertilizer on that basis. He had bought tractor plows and vehicles of various kinds on that basis. He had gone into the year's business in every way on that basis, and they should have let him go through on that basis and pay out on that basis and start anew with the next year free of debt. But they did not do it, and Governor Harding refused to let them have money for that purpose.

Governor Harding said, "They wanted to hold the cotton until it went back to 40 cents and I would not let them do it." Of course, he would not let them do it. He simply admitted the charge I have made that he had it in his power to do it but would not let them do it. That is the truth of the situation.

The spinners of the country said they were willing to pay 30 to 35 cents a pound for cotton. Cotton goods were selling at a price that would warrant more than 40 cents a pound for the raw material. I called attention to the fact that the cotton socks made out of 1 bale of cotton at that time would bring $500, that cotton handkerchiefs made out of 1 bale of cotton at that time would bring $600, and that cotton collars made out of 1 bale of cotton at that time would bring $1,100, and yet Governor Harding was refusing to permit the farmer to get $200 a bale for his cotton when the spinners were making products out of it which were selling for $500, $600, and $1,100.

The farmer himself was compelled to pay these high prices for cotton goods while he was forced to throw his cotton on the market at prices far below the cost of production. I have quoted Mr. Lincoln many times, and shall quote him many more times, on this subject. He said that any change in the circulating medium under which a debt is contracted until the debt is paid is a crime. There it is in a nutshell. They held off deflation until our people in the South and West had obligated themselves in many ways at cotton and wheat prices then obtaining. Why did not Governor Harding and the leaders of the Republican Party and their Wall Street cohorts start this thing in January? The reason why was that the merchant and farmer would say, "If you are going to deflate, that means hard times, a panic, and I am not going to buy any fertilizer." "Oh," the Fertilizer Trust said, "don't start that thing yet. Hold it back until I unload my supply of fertilizer on the farmer. I will have his paper and I will get my money in the next three to five years." Then implement men said, "Don't start that deflation yet. I have millions of dollars' worth of stuff to sell to the farmer, and if you start your deflation he will say, 'Times are hard; the bottom has fallen out of business, and I will not buy.' You would leave millions of dollars' worth of stuff on my hands. Wait until I unload on the merchant and farmer." The tractor plow man said, "Don't start yet. Wait until I get unloaded on the merchant and farmer and get them to sign up and bind themselves to pay my price, based on 40-cent cotton and prosperity conditions."

So Governor Harding and those connected with him waited until the merchants in the South and West had bought heavily and the farmer was tied up in debt to his teeth, and after they got him committed and he had planted his crop and could not get out or undo what he had done they started the drive of deflation on him in June, when it was too late for him to take care of himself. They changed the circulating medium and committed the diabolical crime to which Lincoln referred, getting him in debt under one circulating medium and changing it and forcing him to pay out under quite another and harder circulating medium.

I have called attention heretofore, Mr. President, that when the farmer went into the year's business of 1920 cotton was bringing 40 cents a pound, or $200 a bale. The farmer with 10 bales of cotton who owed $2,000 could pay out with his 10 bales of cotton, but when they reduced the price of it to 10 cents a pound or $50 a bale it would take 4 crops or 40 bales to pay the debt under which he had incurred it when 10 bales would have paid it. That is the crime I am condemning. That is the crime I shall continue to condemn.

Now, I know some people have been greatly surprised about this thing. They never thought that anyone in this body or the other branch of Congress would vigorously take up the fight and dare to fight it to a finish. They had figured on their ability to frighten Members and Senators politically. They said, "We will have so much of the press to hammer on anyone who dares to open his mouth. We will have certain big moneyed interests that made millions out of bonds, that made millions out of cotton by driving it down, that made millions out of grain and cattle. We can marshal all these forces and scare any public man into silence who presumes to question our conduct." That is what they wanted to happen. That is what they expected would happen.

I have no doubt that back in the secret chambers of Wall Street, where the conspiracy was born, they said "Somebody in the Senate or in the House may attack this thing. Somebody may start a fight on us all down the line." Then I imagine they said, "No; we will quickly respond by saying that it is a natural consequence, that the World War produced it, that there was bound to be a collapse, and besides the people will know the truth. We will keep it from them and they will accept our statement. Then we will hammer anyone with that part of the press which we control, and fire editorial broadsides at any Senator who dares to ask for an investigation. We will hammer him into a pulp. Leave it to us. In the meantime Wall Street will have accumulated her millions and hundreds of millions. Then the South will be prone and in the throes of financial disaster and business ruin.

The West will be stretched upon the plains, with her cattle industry destroyed and her grain industry destroyed. But what do they know about it and who will dare to enlighten them? We will tell them that this thing just came, that it had to come, that it is natural for panics to come, and so on. They do not know. We will marshal our financial experts. We will bring our big senatorial guns, that we always have in readiness, to fire a rifle that we will furnish, at any private in the ranks who dares to assail this monstrosity which we are about to put over; that is what we will do. We have certain moneyed interests, we have a certain portion of the press, we have the head of the Federal Reserve Board with the board back of him, and some defenders in the Senate on the Banking and Currency Committee, and some in the House. In the face of all this just let anybody undertake to lift his voice against us and see what happens to him.

From what I have seen since I commenced this fight over two years ago I am persuaded to believe that such a conversation took place between those who deliberately planned to pillage and plunder the country in 1920.

Mr. President, I hail from Alabama. The former governor of the Federal Reserve Board came here from my State. I made a very careful examination of his conduct in connection with deflation, and I became convinced there was something wrong with him. I became convinced that he deliberately carried out a policy that he knew was robbing our people to enrich certain other people. Having that conviction regarding him and those with him in the crime of 1920, I said, "So help me God I will undertake the task of making the truth of this whole thing known," and I did undertake it. What happened? Every place where there was a Federal reserve regional bank editorial broadsides were fired at me. Suggestions came that I ought not to be reelected to the Senate.

Here, as I stood in my place fighting to deliver my people from the curse that was upon them, oppressed with interest rates higher than any Government on the globe ever applied. No king in all the annals of the past ever permitted such a rate to be charged as was charged to people in Alabama. I saw the cotton industry in my State fall down. I saw business crucified under that remorseless policy, and I said I will undertake to go to the bottom of this thing.

The more I exposed the conspiracy and the conspirators, the more broadsides in the form of bought editorials came, saying, "HEFLIN ought not to be reelected." I said, "Why do not they answer my facts and arguments?" While I have stood here in my place week after week and month after month convicting them not only of being conspirators but of being criminals in high places, they were flaunting newspaper attacks in my face, and this governor of the board and his friends in crime were announcing that they were going to see to it that I had opposition. I do not fear—aye, I welcome opposition from them. I have had to do with driving Governor Harding off of the Federal Reserve Board. I can drive any candidate that he selects against me into the thickets of political defeat in a senatorial contest in Alabama. Thank God, my State is not for sale. In all of the battles that she has fought, in all of her glorious past, she has never yet lowered her arm to those who would slander and traduce her.

Do they think they can control my State? "Let the heathen rage and imagine a vain thing," "Alabama, Alabama, I will aye be true to thee!"

They thought with those editorials they could frighten and intimidate me. I received anonymous letters from New York saying, "You are a one termer. How did you get into the Senate? You will never get back," and all that, while I was standing here making the fight for fair treatment to the people that I represent.

Mr. ASHURST. The writers of those letters did sign their names, did they?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; of course they did not sign their names. They merely wished to make me feel good; to let me know that there was something going on up there. But somehow it did not frighten me.

Mr. President, I knew when I took up this fight that it was a big fight. I had a number of my friends here in Washington tell me, "This is a great job you have undertaken; you are going up against tremendous interests, do you know that?"

"These interests are tremendous, and if they combine against you they are powerful." I said, "Yes; I realize that; but I am here in the interest of my people; and, as Esther said to the king 'If I perish, I perish.'" I asked, "What of the soldier on the firing line? We sent him there to do battle, to fire upon the enemy, to be true to the colors, to maintain the best interests of his Government, and to live up to the best traditions of his country." He did it, and he did it on the firing line, mid shot and shell, where his comrades were dying by his side every day. He simply did his duty. If he had not stood, if he had gone to the rear and crossed over the line and had rested in the hands of Germany, betraying his own country in order to protect himself, we would have branded him with the "scarlet letter" of cowardice and treason to the Stars and Stripes; and that is what ought to have been done.

What of me if I am not faithful to the trust? The people of Alabama chose me to be one of their watchmen on the walls; they chose me to be one of the soldiers to come here and do battle in this forum of the Republic. Suppose I should look at a task and say, "It is tremendous; there are great odds against me; they will marshal their cohorts against me and strive to drive me from the scene and defeat the purposes of the fight that I make for honest banking in my country and for the relief of my people." What of me if I shrink from the fight? What of me if I say, "I will move along the lines of least resistance." What of me if I fold my arms and drift and antagonize none of the interests that I know are deadly poison to the welfare of my Nation? What of me if I fail to measure up to the requirements of the hour? What of me if I truckle to them? What of me if I prove unfaithful to the trust that loving hands in my State have laid upon me in the Commonwealth in which I was born and in whose soil my ancestors sleep? What of me if I had shrunk from the task?

Mr. President, I would deserve the condemnation and the scorn of every honest man and woman in my State and of everyone in the Republic. I have dared to make this fight, and I have no apologies for having done so. I am going to keep on preaching this doctrine until every man who had to do with the conspiracy of murderous deflation is driven from public life.

Those who perpetrated the crime of deflation in 1873 were never permitted to forget it; they were punished for it. One by one they were held up to public scorn until one by one they fell by the way. The crime of 1873, in comparison with the deflation crime of 1920, was a May day performance, as compared to the storm of war on the battle fields in France. It was a mild-mannered thing, Mr. President, compared to what we witnessed in 1920 here when there was no cause for it, when the governor of the Federal Reserve Board said:

We have expanded and carried on the World War; we have met every condition of increased business here at home without recourse to the gold reserve; we can expand more without recourse to the gold reserve and we can expand very much more by resorting to the gold reserve.

Why did they not do it? We created the Federal reserve system for that purpose. We created the gold reserve for that purpose and for no other purpose. What is the use of a reserve if it may not be appealed to in the hour of financial peril to save the business of the people? For what was the Federal reserve system created—for the sharks of Wall Street? No; it was created for the masses of the people of America; it was created to preserve intact the business interests of the people of this Republic; it was created for carrying on every legitimate business—small, great, medium, whatever the size of the business—that system was created to take care of it and to see that not even the sign of a panic approached it. That is what it was created for. And it performed that function until the conspirators came upon the scene. Then what happened? They let loose the dogs of deflation and all of this trouble came about.

I have stated before, Mr. President, that in my section of the country I saw people moving through the town in which I live. I asked, "Where are you going?" The reply came, "Down to Lanett, to Langdale, to River View, to the cotton-factory towns." I inquired, "Why are you leaving your farms?" and the reply was, "I have no farm." "What has become of your place?" "Gone under a mortgage." "Where are your mules and your cattle and your cotton and your grain?" "All gone, and I am still in debt," and a lump came in their throats as they talked about it. There were thousands and tens of thousands of such cases in the South.

The same condition prevailed in the West. The other day witnesses testified before the Committee on Agriculture about how hard pressed they were out there. Deflation had done it. The question was asked, "What is the situation in your county?" "Nearly every farm in it is mortgaged." "Anything else?" "Yes; all their live stock is mortgaged." "Anything else?" "Yes; they had to mortgage the growing crops." That is the situation in the West produced under deflation, and that is the situation in my section produced under deflation.

What other evil effect did it have? we asked them, Senators. They said there were in my county in 1920, as I have been informed, 18 suicides. Sixteen men and 2 women killed themselves, driven to it under deflation. In another county there were 17, in another county 15, and so on down in various counties adjoining one another. What else happened? People were driven into the madhouse; the insane asylums were filled up; and others staggered into their graves under the load and burden of deflation.

I ask you, then, are we to permit these criminals to escape? It will never be the judgment of my conscience to permit it. I intend to punish them, and already have punished some; and I am going to continue to hold them up to public scorn and to appeal to the powerful thing called public opinion. Thank God, that has not yet been debauched by the corrupt money power of the United States under the reign of the Republican Party. Somebody has got to cry out against it. Let us continue the fight.

Ah, Mr. President, it ought to be the purpose of every man, Democrat and Republican, to do his part—

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator knows that the Republican Party was not in control in 1920; but the Democrats were in control; and, if the Senator will be perfectly fair, he will tell the people that deflation began in 1919.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no; the Senator is entirely mistaken. Deflation commenced in the late spring of 1920.

Mr. CURTIS. In 1919 a delegation of cattlemen came to Washington from Kansas to protest against what had been done, and, at my request, they were given a hearing.

Mr. HEFLIN. That may have been so in one case, but in 1920—

Mr. CURTIS. The Democrats were in power in 1920.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Democrats were in power in the Executive department; but I have frequently shown to the Senate and the country, and I am going now to undertake to enlighten the Senator from Kansas, that in 1920 President Wilson was stricken down; he was lying on his back, unconscious a part of the time. The Republican Party had carried the House and Senate in 1918. Newberry was in the seat which he had bought in Michigan.

The Republican Party was in control of both bodies. That was the situation. And in the spring of 1920 the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], a Republican, introduced the progressive interest rate amendment into this Republican Senate and secured its passage. It was introduced in the House of Representatives by a member of the Republican Banking and Currency Committee of that body, and there it passed. The Federal reserve act, which had been enacted under the administration of the Democratic Party, was amended by a Republican Congress. Governor Harding himself supported the Republican ticket in the fall of 1920, and I read from the Washington Times here of April 12, 1921, an article which stated that that had placated the Republican leaders and that he would continue in his job as governor of the Federal Reserve Board. He did continue in his job and served until the 9th day of August, 1922. If the Republicans had not favored deflation and indorsed deflation, they would have put him out as soon as they came into power; but they were so well pleased with deflation and with the conduct of W. P. G. Harding that they kept him in as long as the law would allow him to stay, and then he was not reappointed, we are told, because he could not be confirmed in the Senate.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1920 pledged itself to deflation and the Republican candidate for President in his acceptance speech promised deflation. I quoted here once before what my good friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHCROFT] said of a friend of his who told him, "I am going to convert my stuff into money; I am going to make a heap of money this year; the Republicans are going to deflate."

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], himself a millionaire, told me that word was sent to him that they were going to deflate and to get in out of the weather, and he said, "I can not get in; I am all tied up; my business is in such shape it will cost me thousands of dollars if deflation should occur," and he said it did cost him thousands of dollars.

I likened that gruesome picture to a situation where people were sitting in a theater, and while the indiscriminate mass of men, women, and children were looking on the stage, forgetting the hard times and enjoying themselves, in slips some stealthy fellow down the aisle, whispers in the boxes to the elect and wealthy favored few, and says: "Get out of this building! A bomb is going to go off under this building in 15 minutes, and a lot of people are going to be killed. You get out while the getting is good!" You see them gather up their cloaks and hats and retire, and the others sit still. Without a moment's notice or warning the bomb goes off, the building collapses, and death comes to hundreds and to thousands, and the wails of the dying are heard for blocks away.

That is what happened with deflation. You never gave any notice to the poor little merchant of my section. You did not give any notice to the farmer in my section. You did not give any notice to the country banker. You gave notice to nobody but a few financial pets. Those who were in the millionaire class you told to get out, that you were going to deflate, and you caught the others unaware and murdered their business and made millions out of their distress and suffering. That is what happened.

Oh, Mr. President, I know that my Republican friends squirm. I have put this responsibility where it belongs, on Governor Harding, a Republican. I have long since repudiated him as a Democrat. He is no Democrat. He does not know any more about the fundamental principles of Democracy than a mouse-colored mule knows about operating an airplane. [Laughter.] I charge again that he supported the Republican ticket in 1920 and, by the grind of deflation just before election, cost us the States of Arizona, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Tennessee, driven into the Republican Party under the lash of deflation, because the people out there said, "Wilson is still President"; so the Democrats got the responsibility, but it was not properly placed. Wilson was out of commission, and the chief that he had put at the head of the Federal Reserve Board had not only betrayed his chief, but he had betrayed his party, his section, and his country.

He has been rewarded for it. He drew $12,000 a year as governor of the board. They have given him as governor of the bank in Boston $12,000 more, and another thousand on top of that, making $25,000. They gather him and a few of the conspirators that were in it and those that defend them, lay their hands on their heads, and hug them all up in a bunch, and say: "These are our jewels," and they are.

Mr. President, this is not any butterfly parade. This is the most gruesome national crime that has ever been committed against a free people. It is not a sectional crime. It is a national crime. Why? Because they expected to strike down the South and the West; but what happened? The South was unable to pay for the goods in the East. The West was unable to pay for the goods in the East and the North, and then what? The purchasing power of the dollar had been destroyed. Our people could not buy. The market for these people had been destroyed. Then what? The cancellation of orders commenced to pour in. Factories in the East and North closed their doors. They said, "We know how to take care of ourselves. We have already sold a good deal of our stuff to the merchants and farmers. We have their paper for that. We will collect that in the next three or four years, but now we are going to quit operating"; and the poor fellow who stood at the bench or at the forge or worked at the loom was given his orders to get out. He gathered up his little belongings and walked out, with no place to go and nothing to do; and the panic had not only gripped the South and West, but it was feeding upon the vitals of the East and the North. Because the industries closed orders were canceled, 7,000,000 laboring men were turned into the streets, pandemonium reigned in the Republic, Wall Street reaped where she had not sown, and the people of the South and West paid the penalty in millions wrung from their hands, and the distressed wage earners driven out, stripped of their employment, going from place to place seeking work, and there was nothing to do. These are the fruits of the Republican deflation conspiracy, and "by their fruits ye shall know them."

Why, Mr. President, it is plain that some of the Republican leaders encouraged this deflation to be pressed hard just before the election in order to get votes for the Republican Party. It bore down more vigorously in October than it had in any other month previously—October, just before the people went to the polls—so that they would be disgusted with the Democrats. They unloaded it, or tried to, upon us; but truth will out, as murder will out, and what happened?

Why, after Warren G. Harding was nominated for President W. P. G. Harding, this man hand and glove with the Republicans, wired congratulations out to Chicago, congratulating Mr. Harding on his nomination at the hands of the Republican convention. Sitting right here in the Treasury Building, within a hundred yards of his stricken chief, lying on his back, battling for his life, unconscious half the time, this man that he had appointed to office betrayed him, betrayed his party, betrayed his country, was wiring congratulations to the Republican nominee for President; and later on, when that same candidate made his acceptance speech, this same Governor Harding wired him congratulations upon his acceptance speech, and his acceptance speech was a promise to tear down all that had been done by Woodrow Wilson, the very man who had appointed W. P. G. Harding!

Then what? He visited the Republican nominee at Marion, Ohio, in the fall. Then what? When the inauguration was over, in April, 1921, the Times came out and said that Governor Harding would retain his place, because it was known that he had supported the Republican ticket, and that had placated Republican leaders, and he would remain at his post. He did remain at his post, and I stood here day after day asking the Republicans to join with us to drive him out; and in the face of that they held him on and on and on until the 9th day of August, until his term expired by law, and then their Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, went to the President and demanded that he be reappointed.

Talk about the Republicans being free from responsibility! The trail of the serpent is over it all. Mellon demanded that he be reappointed. A Senator from a Northern State, a Republican, polled the Republican side to see how many Senators would vote for his confirmation. It was whispered here that President Harding had said: "If you can get enough votes pledged to confirm him, I will reappoint him"; and I know that the appeal was being made, because a clever Republican came over here and told me, and I looked over and I saw a Senator moving around among his brethren, and I was told that that was what occurred; and they told me that one of them asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] if he would not vote to confirm him, and he said, "I have heard too much of what TOM HEFLIN has had to say about him." Mr. President, the fact that we had so molded opinion in this body that nobody but two Democrats would have voted for him, and scarcely any of the Republicans from the West, kept his name from coming up here, we are told. Let us put the responsibility where it belongs.

What did the Democrats do in convention? They declared against deflation. Go and read the platform. We said that by mismanagement and maladministration of this system hard times might be produced, and they were produced. We cautioned the people to be careful about who was put in charge of that system, but our warning was not heeded. The Republicans got back in power. They had the House and the Senate and the President then, and they permitted that board to stay and everybody who was on it then, except William Poison Gas, and he is off, because under the law the term for which he was appointed expired on the 9th day of August, 1922, and he hung around here, like Grant around Richmond, trying to get himself reappointed.

Why, they sent out their little experts from the reserve system to the State bankers' conventions and tried to get resolutions passed, and got some few passed, indorsing him.

I see a Senator in this Chamber now, a clever western Republican, who told me of an amusing and ridiculous performance in his State. The bankers of his State were in convention, and one of these Federal reserve expert friends got up in the convention in the closing hours and asked to have a resolution passed indorsing Governor Harding for reappointment as governor of the board, and in a perfunctory way a few of them voted for it, though most of them were against it; and when the resolution was passed and the bankers went home, they wrote the Senator telling him of what had occurred and stating that they did not want him reappointed. Why, there was never anything like the intimidation that was practiced. Here were bankers sitting in a sovereign State with the agent of this man present, calling on them to indorse the very man who had smitten them hip and thigh. They were still sore from the bruises, and here he was asking them to indorse him. They thought, of course, he was probably going to be reappointed, or maybe he would be, but when back at home they sat down and wrote their Senators to "please fight this man's appointment. We do not want him appointed."

That is not all. One of the good old citizens, a banker in that State, came down and called on my good friend, this Republican Senator, and presented his credentials.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did the Senator say this man was from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no; he was not from Massachusetts. No, sir. If I had heard that that happened in Massachusetts I would have fainted myself [laughter], but it did not happen in Massachusetts. It happened out in a western State. When this old fellow came from that convention out there here to Washington, he shook hands with this Senator and said: "I want you to go with me up to see the President. I have been sent across the country with these resolutions to present to the President to get Governor Harding reappointed." This Republican Senator said, "Why, I am not for him"; and this old fellow said, "I am not, either." [Laughter.] Now, what do you think of that?

The convention out home was not for him; the old fellow who brought the resolution to the President was not for him; the Senator was not for him; and yet they were going through the farcical performance of presenting a resolution asking for his appointment. Was there ever anything like it under the sun?

Why, Mr. President, no wonder these bankers did not complain to the Federal Reserve Board. They lived in fear and dread of it with Governor Harding at its head. Talk about their complaining to this board. I had many, many complaints from bankers. Other Senators here had complaints. They wrote us letters giving us important facts and saying: "Do not use my name; they can punish me in so many ways." Think of that!

Here is a system that was set up for the purpose of blessing and benefiting all business, big and little. Everyone ought to have been able to cry out to it in their distress and say: "Come to my rescue. You were created to prevent business distress and panic. Here are my little earnings of a lifetime. Here is a home that I have built and paid for, and I own this little piece of land. There are my wife and four or five children. If I am forced to pay these loans now, and this system will not aid me through this time, everything I have made in my life will be gone, and I will still be in debt, with nothing on which to support my wife and children, and I will have nowhere to go. Will you not come to my rescue? They created you for that purpose." Instead of doing that, the Federal reserve bank was forced to say, "No; throw your stuff on the market. We are going to clean up."

Then people talk about a fellow like that coming up a second time and complaining openly to a concern that struck him over the head with a club when he asked for help. He would at least like to escape with his life. That is all they left—just his life. They took everything he had but his life, and they drove many men insane, so that they took their lives.

Buck Mitchell, in my old district, in my native county, in fact, a poor boy, had struggled up the way along from his youth time. He accumulated some property, and at the time of his death he was worth probably a quarter of a million dollars and owed about fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. They pressed him to pay. They called the loans. He was a merchant and a little banker and a farmer and owned several plantations. He was carrying those poor people along. He knew what it was to struggle through hard times, and he was helping young men who struggled as he had struggled, and instead of encouraging and helping that noble, big-hearted man they pressed him to the wall. They were about to sacrifice all of his property, and he said, "It is more than I can stand," and he put a pistol to his temple and blew his brains out. He is dead. He sleeps in the soil of old Randolph County to-day, and I can see his ghost, with its accusing finger pointing at W. P. G. Harding and his conspirators, and saying: "You sent me down to death."

Thousands of men killed themselves under that dreadful deflation drive. Then people talk about that thing just being the natural consequence of war. It is not so. That it had to come. It is not true. That the gold reserve was about to be reached. There is not a word of truth in it. They could have put out two billions more under the facts as given in their own reports, which I have had printed in the RECORD time and time again, instead of calling in a billion of money and a billion in credit. Of course, it was criminal, murderous deflation.

Mr. President, I wanted to make these remarks to-day following the very remarkable report which the Senator from Utah had read, and I want those who read the RECORD to know that that report is challenged and its argument refuted and its fallacies laid bare. I want the public to know, because they are going to keep an eye on this great banking system. This Federal reserve system, by the help of those who are still free, shall not be run any more in the interest of the money changers of Wall Street. Their days are numbered. A new order has come. Crissinger will, in my judgment, be fair and honest in his administration of the system. It has been said by certain people that he agrees with the policy of Governor Harding. It is not so. He challenged his policies.

Not long after I made a speech in the Senate on my resolution to reduce the rediscount rate. Crissinger made a speech in the West and said it ought to be reduced, and he was criticized in the East for saying that. He never has been in favor of the policies of W. P. G. Harding. He has been a very helpful influence on the board, and I am glad to see him at the head of it. He is an honest man and I think a fair man, and I rejoice that we have a new deal. It was a long, hard fight, Mr. President.

I know what my duty is in connection with this matter. I helped to create the Federal reserve banking law. I made some suggestions about the provisions in it regarding the loans on cotton warehouse receipts and helped to get them in the law. I want the law so administered that it will be helpful to every business interest in the country. I do not care whether a man's business is worth $100 or $100,000 or $100,000,000, I want this system to reach out and answer the business needs of every man and woman beneath the flag. That is the purpose of it, and as long as I am a Member of this body I shall fight for an honest administration of it; and if I live I want to say to the deflationists and their conspiring friends who have designs on my seat that I am hoping and expecting to stay here some time. I know that that statement will not be very pleasing to certain people and certain interests.

The suggestion of opposition to me does not come from the great body of the people in my State. It comes from without the State. The activities of certain special interests cause me to feel like telling some very near friends that if I get sick I want then to see to it that I do not fall into their hands. I would dislike for some of them, as trained nurses, to have me in charge if I should get sick. I would dislike for one of them to have the opportunity of prescribing for me. They seem anxious to get rid of me. They want my seat for some one to their liking, but they will not get it.

Mr. President, I was about to remark that as long as I am a Senator in this body I shall reserve the right to complain if the Federal Reserve Board is charging the people of my State and my section a higher discount rate than they charge in New York or anywhere else. Is there anything wrong in that?

That statement is made from a fair sense of justice. Why should they make it harder for the people in my section engaged in legitimate business to get money than for the speculators in Wall Street to get it? Why should they charge the people of the South and West a higher rate of interest than they charge the people in the East? I reserve the right to criticize them whenever they discriminate against the people that I in part represent.

I have seen the good results which have come from this long fight that I and some others here and elsewhere have made. We have forced a reduction in the discount rate by it.

As John Skelton Williams said in this letter, not until I and others began this fight did they disgorge a cent of this usurious interest. They are not through yet. We used to get money at 4½ per cent before deflation came. Think of raising the discount rate to even 7½ on top of what we used to pay. That is a heavy burden. I want them to pay back that interest down to 6 per cent. They ought to be made to pay back to 6, and if they would these little banks which they gouged so hard would get a goodly sum back. They do not want to give the names of the banks and do not want to pay the money back. Those who got the money do not want to disgorge. They know that if we can get the names and the specific amounts we will make them disgorge. That is the reason they do not want to give them. No matter what reason they give, that is the truth. I can take any half dozen Senators in this body, who will fight in earnest, as some few have fought with me on this question, and if the Federal Reserve Board should undertake to do a thing like this again, arraign them before this body and before the bar of public opinion and make them slow to pull off a deal like that.

We are the representatives of the people. We ought to stand for justice in these matters. Why not use our power? I ought not to be criticized for demanding a square deal for all interests. I ought to be commended for it. This is our country, this is our Senate, and if a Senator from a sovereign State can point out that the board is doing wrong the country ought to know it, and if they say they are not wrong let them answer it on this floor and in the press and tell the truth, not juggle figures and evade the issue; let us all give the whole truth to the bankers and the people of the country.

Mr. President, there is hope of a better day in the banking business of the country. The power that we have, if properly used, will help to bring such a day, and I pledge my humble services to the bringing about of such a blessed day. The honest, average business man, farmer, and banker would all rejoice to see such a day. God speed it.

MEMORIAL IN FRANCE TO SEVENTY-NINTH DIVISION.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OGDRE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, for the consideration of which I desire to ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4398) in recognition of the valor of the officers and men of the Seventy-ninth Division who were killed in action or died of wounds received in action. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has showed me the bill which he has just reported. It is a very meritorious bill and should have early action. I am willing that it be now considered, provided that there shall be no debate upon it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not expect there will be any debate on the bill. There are certain amendments to the bill which have been recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 23, to strike out the words "World War Memorial Commission" and to insert the words "Commission of Fine Arts," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That to commemorate the heroic achievement of the Seventy-ninth Division in the taking of Montfaucon and to perpetuate the memories of the officers and men of the division who were killed in action or died of wounds received in action, the Seventy-ninth Division Association is hereby authorized to cause to be erected in France, on the heights of Montfaucon or on such other suitable site as may be selected by them, a monument to the battle dead of the Seventy-ninth Division, American Expeditionary Forces in the World War, and to place on the monument, as part of the design and memorial thereon an enlarged replica of the Distinguished Service Cross of the United States with a suitable inscription reciting that the replica of the Distinguished Service Cross of the United States has been authorized by this act of Congress in recognition of the valor and heroic achievement of the officers and men of the Seventy-ninth Division who were killed in action or died of wounds received in action, and such other data as the association may deem proper: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the monument shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Pennsylvania make a brief explanation of the bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to do that, without taking much time.

The Seventy-ninth Division, in the attack in the Argonne on September 26 and 27, 1918, captured by frontal assault a fortified German position which was known as Montfaucon, a hill which had been fortified throughout four years and which had been considered entirely impregnable to assault. In the capture of that hill the division lost very severely in both officers and men by shell fire and machine-gun fire.

The Association of the Seventy-ninth Division is about to erect a monument on the hill near the site of the place where the Crown Prince of Germany had established a great concrete fortress for his own protection in observation of the attack on Verdun. It is proposed by this bill to give the authority of the United States to the division association to place on that monument a replica of the Distinguished Service Cross in recognition of the valor and heroism of those men who were killed in action or who died as the result of wounds received in action. The bill does not propose to confer any honor on any living man; it authorizes no living person to carry any decoration. Neither does the bill carry any appropriation on the part of the Government, as the whole cost of land and monument will be borne by the survivors of the Seventy-ninth Division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the bill further, on page 2, line 8, by inserting after the word "authorized" the words "if consent shall be given by the proper authorities of the Republic of France."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the committee recommends an amendment to the second paragraph of the preamble, which I desire may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the committee to the preamble will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee reports an amendment to the preamble, in the second clause, before the word "fire," to strike out the word "shell" and to insert the article "the," so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas in the battle of Argonne in September, 1918, the German fortified position of Montfaucon, dominating the plateau west of the Meuse River, which had been considered almost impregnable to assault, was taken by the Seventy-ninth Division of the American Expeditionary Forces by a frontal attack against the stubborn resistance by the enemy; and

Whereas in that attack the division distinguished itself by extraordinary heroism and intrepidity under the fire of the enemy; and

Whereas it is suitable that the valor and achievement of that division be suitably recognized by the Congress, and that an appropriate memorial be made to the heroism of the officers and men of the division who were killed or died of wounds received in action.

The amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

RATES OF DISCOUNT OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the Senator will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have not entered into the discussion as to the rates of interest charged under the amendment to the Federal reserve act providing for a progressive and graduated interest rate after a bank had passed a certain basic line established by the Federal Reserve Board. I have an official communication here which was transmitted to me on January 18, 1922, and signed T. P. Kane, Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, addressed to me, and reading as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your request of the 17th instant there is inclosed a memorandum giving the information desired by you regarding the minimum and maximum rate of discount charged by the various Federal reserve banks under the progressive or graduated amendment to the Federal reserve act. This information was furnished by the Federal Reserve Board.

Yours truly,

T. P. KANE, Deputy Comptroller.

The following table shows the maximum rate of discount charged by the various Federal reserve banks under the progressive or graduated amendment to the Federal reserve act on a portion of the member bank's borrowings:

Bank.	Rate.	Date of rediscout.
	Per cent.
Atlanta.....	87½	Sept., 1920
St. Louis.....	26	Jan., 1921
Kansas City.....	22½	June, 1920
Dallas.....	13	Aug., 1920

The records of the Federal Reserve Board show that the Federal reserve banks of Atlanta and Kansas City rebated all discount charged member banks in excess of 12 per cent.

I thought, as this discussion had assumed an indefinite form, this was a very concrete and boiled-down statement, and verified the statement that 87½ per cent had been charged upon a portion, at least, of the borrowings of a member bank.

When this measure comes up for discussion, I shall have something to say about the necessity for retaining any such measure on our statute books.

THE SEIZURE OF THE RUHR VALLEY BY FRANCE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Versailles treaty, part 7, annex 11, paragraph 18, contains the following words:

The measures which the allied and associated powers shall have the right to take in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances.

It will be remembered that Rumania invaded Hungary to collect reparations immediately after the armistice and that the Allies, led by France, rebuked Rumania for a violation of the treaty of Versailles, and at a time when M. Loucheur, of France, was then chairman of the Reparation Commission and Mr. Clemenceau was president of the Peace Conference, and that Clemenceau signed the note to Rumania on August 23, 1919, as follows:

The Peace Conference is in receipt of information, the accuracy of which, unfortunately, it seems impossible to question, that Rumanian forces in Hungary are continuing the systematic seizure and removal of Hungarian property.

In view of the recent correspondence between the Peace Conference and the Rumanian Government it is difficult for the allied and associated powers to comprehend such action of the Rumanian Government, except on the hypothesis that the Rumanian Government ignores the accepted principles of reparation.

The Rumanian Government, as a participant in the labors of the Peace Conference and as a signatory of the treaty of peace with Germany, should not, however, be unaware of the care which has been exercised by the allied and associated powers to provide for an orderly scheme of reparation.

If indemnification for damage suffered had been left dependent upon such factors as geographical proximity to enemy assets or upon the result of competition between allied States in possessing themselves of such assets, it would have been inevitable that flagrant injustices and serious discord would result. Accordingly, the treaty with Germany, to which Rumania is a party, consecrates certain fundamental principles of reparation, notably: * * *

(3) A central Reparation Commission is established as an exclusive agency of the allied and associated powers for the collection and distribution of enemy assets by way of reparation. * * *

The acts referred to likewise depart from the agreed principle that the Reparation Commission should act as the exclusive agency of all of the allied and associated powers in the collection of enemy assets by way of reparation.

The further possible consequence of the course of action which Rumania appears to have adopted are so serious and fraught with such danger to the orderly restoration of Europe that the allied and associated powers would, if necessity arose, feel constrained to adopt a most vigorous course of action to avoid these consequences.

For it is obvious that if the collection of reparation were to be allowed to degenerate into individual and competitive action by the several allied and associated powers, injustice will be done and cupid-ity will be aroused and, in the confusion of uncoordinated action, the enemy will either evade or be incapacitated from making the maximum of reparation.

The allied and associated powers can not, however, believe that the Government of Rumania would create and force the allied and associated powers to deal with such a danger.

The Peace Conference accordingly awaits from the Government of Rumania an immediate and unequivocal declaration:

(1) That the Government of Rumania recognizes the principle that the assets of enemy States are a common security for all of the allied and associated powers:

(2) That it recognizes the Reparation Commission as the exclusive agency for the collection of enemy assets by way of reparation.

Rumania withdrew from Hungary. Therefore the treaty of Versailles was interpreted by France itself, through its most distinguished representatives, to forbid one of the Allies to take the initiative and attempt to collect reparations on its own initiative and with its own force.

The interpretation by France of the treaty of Versailles in regard to Rumania was a proper and righteous interpretation, but now the French statesmen are contending that paragraph 18, above quoted, of Part VII, of the treaty of Versailles, justifies her invasion of Germany and gives France the right to independent action, although, I understand, that England's chief law officers claim that this is not a righteous interpretation and does not give France a right to invade Germany for the collection of reparations.

Mr. President, the American papers are full of the seizure of the Ruhr Valley, its coal mines, its industries, by France, and the leaders of mankind are full of perplexity at the grave consequences which may ensue by the military invasion of German territory by France.

When the German people were being led by the military dynasty of the Hohenzollern leadership against France the great body of American opinion was keenly sympathetic with France. Then France was being invaded without moral right by military force and brute power. Then there was a contest between monarchy and democracy, between military autocracy and representative government.

Now France is invading Germany with military force, with her former Allies standing aghast at the procedure. Now it is no longer a contest between German monarchy and French democracy. It becomes a contest between French leadership and German leadership, severally representing the French and German people, who are assumed to have a truly representative government, and a question arises as to the legal rights of the French leaders to invade Germany and of their moral right to do so. It is obvious that the Allies of France and Belgium do not approve this step; that the world does not approve it. The question of legal right under the treaty of Versailles is challenged by men of the highest ability. That may be left as a controverted question. I merely wish to make an observation on the moral right of France to do this and the political wisdom of this procedure.

The French leaders undoubtedly believe that the German leaders are trying to evade the payment of the reparations provided by the treaty of Versailles and have determined that they will not permit it. It seems highly probable the people of Germany, especially those of great wealth, are at heart opposed to paying the reparations to the extent fixed by the Versailles treaty. The French leaders seem determined to use whatever military force is necessary to compel the German people to pay the amount fixed by France in the treaty of Versailles.

The treaty of Versailles was written by the victors and was a dictated treaty and was not written in the light of the 14 points laid down by the President of the United States and accepted by the Allies and by the German leaders as a basis upon which the German authorities agreed to the armistice in behalf of the German people. The 14 points and the speeches of President Woodrow Wilson upon which the Germans agreed to the armistice required the treaty to be based upon strict justice and upon high moral grounds. Therefore, the world has a right to inquire into this matter upon that basis.

The treaty of Versailles is not conclusive under the circumstances. The German people who are to pay the penalties have a moral right to expect that the reparations honorably and justly due to France and Belgium should be fixed at a figure which would be just and fair, and that these figures should be determined by disinterested powers and not dictated by the sword. The brutal conduct of Bismarck in dealing with the French in 1871 was a bad example and does not constitute a moral precedent upon which to determine this matter.

When we come to consider the matter of reparations, I believe all the world will agree that as between the people involved the actual cost of repairing the devastated region of France and Belgium ought to be borne by the German people. The actual cost the Germans can assuredly meet, but the actual cost should be ascertained in a judicial manner, where so earnestly controverted, not by a victor's dictum.

It is impossible for any reparation to be made for the death of the millions of men involved in the struggle.

When we come to consider this matter from a moral and ethical standpoint it may be now seen, after five years from the termination of the conflict, that this devastation of life can not justly or fairly be visited upon the unhappy peoples who were afflicted by it.

The amount of the physical reparations and the payment of these reparations by the German people should be considered in the light of the extent to which the German people were themselves the victims of a structure of government which had been built up through generations of men. The Hohenzollerns claimed to rule by Divine right, and they had control of the military and naval power; they had control of the legislative powers of the people of Germany. It was not a government based upon the consent of the people. It was a government ruling the people without their consent. It was a government controlling the purse of the German people. It was a government controlling the press absolutely, controlling the pulpit, the schools, the forum, every avenue of intelligence and communication, and, in very large measure, the expression of public opinion.

When the Kaiser and his military and naval leaders determined upon war there was no organized public opinion in Germany which had the least power to oppose it. No young German summoned to the colors by the order of mobilization had any option. Every German youth was absolutely compelled to answer the order under penalty of a drumhead court-martial and a firing squad consigning him immediately to an ignominious grave as a traitor to his country, as a traitor to his brothers and kinsmen, as a coward or a rebel, if he failed to come. He had only the option of coming, weeping or singing. He came singing.

Public opinion in Germany was completely enslaved by the Hohenzollern machine. The people did not know the facts. They had presented to them as facts flagrant falsehood. They had overwhelming argument submitted by their leaders which they had no means of answering.

Half of the German people were women, who had no voice whatever in public affairs, or pretended voice. A large part of the German population were minors, with no voice or pretense of voice. Millions of them were in complete infancy, and before the reparations shall have been paid a majority of the German people who pay the reparations will have been brought into being in this world subsequent to and without any responsibility whatever for the World War and the devastations which were inflicted upon the unhappy people of France and Belgium and upon their Allies.

Morally it can not be assumed that the unborn babe is responsible for the World War.

Morally it can not be assumed that the women of Germany and the minors of Germany were responsible for the World War.

The moral responsibility rested upon William II, now living in luxury in Holland, upon Ludendorff, Hindenburg, and the military and naval leaders of Germany.

And the leaders of the world have measurably condoned the moral responsibility of this culpable leadership of Germany and have imposed no penalties upon them for their crimes in leading the German people into this devastating war. Instead they have contented themselves with imposing economic penalties upon the German people, who were already afflicted to death by monarchy, and who are being afflicted by the results of this war almost as much as the people of the Allies. In the great thing, the destruction of life, the maiming of men, the German people have suffered just about the same as the French and Belgians and English and Italians and Americans. The leaders of the Allies have condoned the conduct of the leadership of Germany and they are contenting themselves with economic reparations imposed on the common people of Germany, upon whom always falls most heavily the folly of human leadership.

Mr. President, the people of America have had a great sympathy with France and Belgium in the gigantic wrongs done them, but the people of America desire absolute justice from a moral and ethical standpoint to be done. They desire the peace of the world. They desire that the productive powers of mankind shall be brought to a speedy maximum in order to make possible the economic reparation for the damages of war.

The invasion of Germany by the French military forces will not meet the moral approval of America, first, because they see in this invasion the sowing of dragons' teeth, the building up of a more intense hatred between the German and French people, and the building up of greater hostilities between those who will sympathize with Germany on the one hand and the French and the Belgians on the other, dividing the world again into two vast contending camps, where the ultimate attitude may be another appeal to organized military force.

Second, because the French leadership seems to be indisposed to allow controverted questions as to the amount of the reparations and the means of collecting reparations to be settled by economic methods. They have dictated the amount, the terms, and are collecting or trying to collect by military force, and they will probably break down the productive power of the German people.

If France and Belgium should show a disposition to permit the intermediation of friendly nations on these questions and to invite such mediation before it is too late, there would be an outburst of approval in America of such an attitude.

It will be very deplorable if French leadership should persist in a policy which will alienate the confidence and respect of the world. The rattling of sabers does not appeal to American opinion, and the best friends of the French people in America are deploring a policy which they fear will ultimately do France irreparable injury.

I believe we should, before it is too late, join the other great nations in some plan for guaranteeing France from invasion, under the principles of the League of Nations, but only on the condition that France itself does not invade other countries. I think the German people should have the same guaranty from the world of freedom from invasion and that the world should use economic pressure on the German people to enforce reparations to the extent a world tribunal shall ascertain such reparations are due and payable.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, for many days in this Chamber we have heard expressions of sympathy with one side or the other in the present European crisis. We have heard more expressions of sympathy with the Germans than with the French. I think these questions ought to be looked at from the standpoint of the American; not the pro-French, not the pro-German, but the pro-American, and I believe there is a distinct pro-American policy which should be followed, not only in the debates here, but in the actions of our administration.

There is a tendency these days, Mr. President, among a certain group of people, to take pains to show pity for the criminal who has met with justice. We find people in America who are inclined to send flowers to murderers, and to forget the crimes which brought the murderers to their present pass. They complain of the rudeness of the warden to the imprisoned convict, and they never think of the victim of that convict's original crime. That is what we are in danger of doing now in our discussion of this crisis on the Ruhr. We are forgetting what it was that brought Germany to her present difficulties. We are forgetting why the French have found it necessary to invade that district. We are forgetting what those Germans did to bring themselves into the predicament in which they find themselves to-day.

Mr. President, why the sudden outbreak of sympathy for one of those two nations? Why was it that in 1914 we did not break out with a similar outburst of sympathy with the Belgians? Heaven knows their country was invaded with fire and with sword, and not merely the threat of it. Their country was invaded in direct violation of a treaty to which this country was a party, and yet we did not raise our voices in this fashion to sympathize with the Belgians who were invaded.

Northern France was devastated, its churches, its homes, its fields, and its orchards laid waste, but somehow our sympathy did not break into voice the way it has been doing here in recent days.

All the laws of nations were defied when the Germans let loose their poison gas at Ypres, and we sat quiet. We did not protest then, as we are doing now, at a peaceable occupation that is not attended by murder and disregard of international law.

The women and children at Lille were deported by the invader, and sent off in practical slavery to work in German factories; but somehow the Senate of the United States remembered then that it was American, and it managed then to control its expressions of sympathy.

When, in the spring of 1915, our German friends, with whom we were at peace, saw fit to torpedo the Lusitania, and hundreds of Americans had their shrieks of agony stifled with the gurgle of death as they sank into the Atlantic Ocean, somehow we managed to stay neutral. Then why in God's name can we not stay neutral to-day, when retribution is coming to those murderers of Belgians, and French, and Americans?

What is it that drags us to the front now to protest because Germany has to pay what she has promised to pay? Why should we suddenly grow maudlin in sympathy because the murderer is having to expiate his crime? Why should America throw herself into this present controversy in the Ruhr and take steps to show her pity for these people who are asked to pay only what they have promised to pay, who have been excused from the payment of penalties, who have been excused by us from the payment of our war costs, who have been excused for all the burdens of taxation they have thrown on the civilized nations of the world?

There is talk about the unborn children of Germany having to pay these reparations. Mr. President, there is not a man or a woman or a child who hears my voice at this minute who will not be dead long before the American people have ceased to pay excessive taxes as the result of German violation of international law. We will all be dead before American taxpayers have ceased to pay tribute to Germany's desire to control the world. Do not we forget that when we begin to wallow in sympathy with German taxpayers?

Mr. President, what Germany is asked to pay now is the mere cost of restoration of the damage she did in Belgium and France and the mere cost of the police force which has had to stand guard along the Rhine.

I am not speaking alone my own sentiments, my own private views. I think I am speaking as the Americans who fought in France would speak if they were here in the Chamber; I think I am speaking as our men who died in France would speak if they could utter their thought to-day. I tell you, Mr. President, we are forgetting our own dead when we begin to waste sympathy because France has levied execution for this reparations debt.

Mr. President, there was a default—clearly there was a default—in the reparations payable by Germany; clearly there is no inclination on the part of the Germans to pay those reparations. The bully who swaggered in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 now whines because he is beaten. Every bully whines when he is beaten. Are we going to allow ourselves to be deceived by that?

What talk did we hear of unborn generations of French when in 1916 and 1917 the Germans thought they were going to win, and their experts were busy calculating what was the utmost franc they could make France pay, and what was the utmost pound that they could make Great Britain pay, and what was the last dollar that they could squeeze out of this great Nation of ours, which they so mightily envied? Did any of the Germans stop to think about the unborn generations of American children whom they then proposed to tax? If they did their voices did not reach our ears. There was no sympathy shown then in what they were doing and what they proposed to do to us.

Mr. President, of all the lost arts of which we are deprived to-day, including the art of tempering copper and the various arts of glass working that have disappeared from civilization, there is no art that is so much missed as the art of minding one's own business.

It has fallen into disuse. We have forgotten how to mind our own business. But in that, if we can revive that art, lies the true American policy. This affair is not our concern. We said we did not want reparations; therefore we are not a creditor. We need not show a pro-French sympathy if for any reason we prefer not to, but for God's sake, Mr. President, let us not sympathize with the murderer. Let us stand off and let France collect her debt if she can.

We are told they are starving Germans in the Ruhr district, but by whom are we told it? By a German communique. If German official announcements of current events are truthful to-day, it is the first time since 1914 that they have been truthful, and we need not get excited about the French starving the Germans until we have some better evidence of it than a statement from Berlin. Our policy should be—and again I say it—our policy should be to mind our own business, particularly now, when our ally and our comrade on the battle field is trying to get no more than has been promised to her.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I would like to remind the Senate of what took place in San Francisco after the great fire in 1906, and to couple with it the fact that the men in Germany who directed the great insurance companies which welched in paying the just claims they owed to the people of San Francisco, when the insurance companies of our country, England, and France paid them what they owed, are among the men to-day in Germany who are trying to discount the amount of reparations which are due France.

Mr. President, how soon we forget! Let us look back to those days of 1906 in San Francisco and remember that there were thousands of people who suffered because of that German repudiation of just debts, and suffered severely to the extent of many millions of dollars. One result of the loss of this money was much suffering to countless women and children in California. That repudiation was an unfriendly and dishonest economic invasion of the United States by Germany which should not be forgotten by the people of our country. I feel that to-day we should not turn a deaf ear to those who are trying to collect their just debts from Germany.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, last evening, in the city of New York, a very distinguished citizen of the United States made a speech. He was speaking at Sherry's on the foreign situation. He was a very prominent candidate for the Presidency at the last Republican national convention. He received a great number of votes in that convention. He stands high in the country. He has recently toured Europe, and his views should be read by people generally. I desire to have read at this time, because it is not long, excerpts from the speech that was made by Governor Lowden, of Illinois, on last evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, Saturday, Jan. 27, 1923.]

Criticism of the foreign policy of the national administration with specific condemnation of the withdrawal of American troops from the Rhine was expressed last night by Frank O. Lowden, former Governor of Illinois and a leading candidate for the Republican nomination for President in 1920, in a speech at the dinner of the Council on Foreign Relations at Sherry's, East Forty-ninth Street and Park Avenue.

Ex-Governor Lowden condemned the policy of isolation, declared the United States had not had isolation during the last generation, and asserted that the price this country would have to pay to get it back would be the sacrifice of 30 per cent of its wheat fields, 20 per cent of its corn fields, 30 per cent of its cotton fields, the closing of part of its mines, and a general revolution of commerce and industry.

He declared he did not see why it should be the American policy to hold aloof from European affairs and asserted that the United States had not done its full duty since the armistice.

"The statesmen of the world are pursuing shadows," he said. "Since the armistice was signed they have indulged in all kinds of illusions."

REPARATIONS TOO MUCH FOR GERMANY.

He said the trouble in France was that that country had been balancing its budget by including the German reparations, which it was humanly impossible for Germany to pay. He said that the high taxes here had impeded business, and that it was obvious that Germany could never set up the taxation to produce the enormous revenue. He added that there was a false impression that Germany was at work and feeling prosperity, but that what had happened in that country was but the result which always follows an inflated currency.

Governor Lowden, who returned recently from Europe, said he found the people there had generally gone to work and had regained their sanity more quickly than the statesmen. The people of Europe, he said, had implicit confidence in the integrity of the United States and its people and deep respect for the moral influence of this Nation.

"The question is how long will that moral influence remain in view of our present attitude toward Europe," he said. He condemned the withdrawal of the American troops from the Rhineland and told how the order threw the allied high commissioners into almost a panic.

"The Belgian commissioner appealed to me," he said. "He said that anything might happen if the American troops were recalled. He urged that 1,500 men be left, or, if that were impossible, 50 men—enough for a guard for our flag. That flag withdrawn, the Belgian commissioner said, the people will believe that America has lost faith in us and given us up."

"NO RIGHT TO HAUL DOWN FLAG."

He added that Berlin was equally insistent, and said:

"We didn't have any right to haul down the flag there."

Referring to the isolation of America, Governor Lowden said that the world might be sweet to many Americans but the fact was that America had not had isolation for a generation. "As soon as we recognize that fact," he continued, "we will effect an effective foreign policy."

"Since we are involved in the world's affairs, are we going to do something to avoid a war, or are we going to wait until we are engaged in another great war?"

"If we are willing to pay the price, maybe we can get back our isolation. But let me tell you the price. It would be the reversion of 30 per cent of our wheat fields and 20 per cent of our corn fields back to the native prairie land; 50 per cent of the cotton fields of the South would go back to the original forest; we would close up a lot of copper mines; and we would have to completely revolutionize our industry and commerce if we would regain that isolation which we long ago lost. Are we willing to pay the price?"

Governor Lowden said he sympathized with France in her attempt to force the payment of the German reparations by the invasion of the Ruhr but did not believe it would do any good. He recalled that at the Versailles Peace Conference France demanded the land to the Rhine on the ground that upon it depended her safety from future aggression from the Central Powers. "The United States denied this and, I believe, rightly denied it," Governor Lowden added. "It offered instead the guarantee of the League of Nations. France said, 'all right.' We refused to ratify the treaty and every consideration to France in the peace treaty failed."

SEES NOTHING FOR FRANCE.

"While I can understand it, I can not see what France is going to get out of the invasion of the Ruhr. I think it is a mistake because it isn't profitable to occupy by military force somebody else's country. It isn't good business. You can make more out of voluntary than out of enforced labor. The Great War has proven also that war is unprofitable even for the conquering nations."

Governor Lowden said he thought if the statesmen of the world, including the American statesmen, had interested themselves more in the question of reparations, much difficulty would have been avoided. He asserted that the United States was interested in the question. "Weren't we interested in whether the German Republic should endure or the military party come back?" he said.

"I don't think that we really have done quite our full part since the armistice was signed to heal up the wounds of the greatest of all wars. I don't know why we should say that it is the American policy to hold absolutely aloof."

He then cited specific instances during the last 20 years where the United States had participated in world affairs. He cited the policy of the open door in China, the Algeiras conference, where war between Germany and France was averted in great part through the suggestions of an American President, and in which the United States had representatives.

"If that principle of the open door, equal opportunity to all nations, even those in out-of-the-way and backward places, should be adopted, it would do more for peace than almost anything else. The chancelleries of the world are more concerned in getting oil concessions than in the peace of the world. Some new formula must be worked out of the possession of the raw materials of the world."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, without taking the time of the Senate to read, I will ask to have inserted in the Record in 8-point type articles 232, 233, and 234 of Part VIII of the Versailles treaty, which sets forth the plan by which the reparation was to be made.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the Record in 8-point type, as follows:

ARTICLE 232.

The allied and associated Governments recognize that the resources of Germany are not adequate, after taking into account permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present treaty, to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage.

The allied and associated Governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied or associated power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea, and from the air, and in general all damage as defined in Annex I hereto.

In accordance with Germany's pledges, already given, as to complete restoration for Belgium, Germany undertakes, in addition to the compensation for damage elsewhere in this part provided for, as a consequence of the violation of the treaty of 1839, to make reimbursement of all sums which Belgium has borrowed from the allied and associated Governments up to November 11, 1918, together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on such sums. This amount shall be determined by the Reparation Commission, and the German Government undertakes thereupon forthwith to make a special issue of bearer bonds to an equivalent amount payable in marks gold, on May 1, 1926, or, at the option of the German Government, on the 1st of May in any year up to 1926. Subject to the foregoing, the form of such bonds shall be determined by the Reparation Commission. Such bonds shall be handed over to the Reparation Commission, which has authority to take and acknowledge receipt thereof on behalf of Belgium.

ARTICLE 233.

The amount of the above damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany shall be determined by an interallied commission, to be called the Reparation Commission, and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes II to VII, inclusive, hereto.

This commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard.

The findings of the commission as to the amount of damage defined as above shall be concluded and notified to the German Government on or before May 1, 1921, as representing the extent of that Government's obligations.

The commission shall concurrently draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within a period of 30 years from May 1, 1921. If, however, within the period mentioned Germany fails to discharge her obligations any balance remaining unpaid may, within the discretion of the commission, be postponed for settlement in subsequent years or may be handled otherwise in such manner as the allied and associated Governments, acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in this part of the present treaty, shall determine.

ARTICLE 234.

The Reparation Commission shall, after May 1, 1921, from time to time consider the resources and capacity of Germany, and after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard shall have discretion to extend the date and to modify the form of payments, such as are to be provided for in accordance with article 233, but not to cancel any part, except with the specific authority of the several Governments represented upon the commission.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to take only a moment or two to reply to the suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. That Senator emphasizes the criminal conduct of Germany. I differentiate between the criminal conduct of the military leaders of the Hohenzollern dynasty and the mass of the German people who were the subjects and victims of that organized military and political power. I made that distinction very clearly in what I had to say, but I do not know whether or not the Senator from Pennsylvania was then present.

The Senator from Pennsylvania also emphasizes the great importance of minding our own business. We did not think when the great World War broke out in 1914 that we were concerned in the wrongs then done to Belgium. We made a great mistake. We ought to have protested, instantly Belgium was invaded, the violation of her sovereignty and of her territorial integrity.

When one nation is allowed to be broken down by such conduct all the nations in the world are jeopardized and a policy is pursued which is destined to break down the peace of the world in which we are greatly concerned. It is emphatically "our business." I do not believe in the doctrine of Cain, who, in response to the inquiry, "Where is thy brother?" asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Cain assumed no responsibility for his brother Abel's safety. He asserted before God it was "none of his business." I want to tell the Senator from Pennsylvania and tell the Senate that it is "our business" to speak the voice of morality and of justice among men and to say to France in a voice that shall be heard, "Keep out of Germany," and to say to Germany, "Keep out of France." That is the only way we are going to have peace on earth. We can not consent that nations without objection—and with a silence "that gives consent" on our part—may invade other nations and then expect that it will not react upon us and upon all the world.

I do not feel so much concern about the commercial aspect to which Governor Lowden referred. If Europe is kept in an eternal broil, if the productive powers of Europe are broken down, it is true that Europe can not create commodity values, send them to our country, and establish the credit with which to buy cotton and corn and wheat and copper, and that is an important matter. It is a more important matter that there should be peace on earth. I am concerned in that; the United States is concerned in it; the whole world is concerned in it.

A plan has been arranged by which 51 nations have already pledged themselves to protect France from invasion. It is difficult for me to believe that French leadership is afraid of the invasion of France by Germany, whose powers to make and hold arms have been taken away, when 51 nations stand behind France to protect France against invasion, when Great Britain was willing to make a special guaranty to France, and when our great Nation has, by its declaration of principle, expressed its sympathy against the invasion of France, and when Germany proposes a solemn pledge to the world not to invade France.

The principle of territorial integrity and political independence is vital. It must be maintained if world peace is to be maintained. The French leaders, having such guaranty against invasion, are now breaking down the principle agreed to in the League of Nations, Article X, by which French safety from future invasion was safeguarded and will justify the world in abandoning the guaranty as far as France is concerned.

We went into the last war not for sordid purposes, but to establish liberty throughout the world. That is what our sons fought for and that is what they died for—not the liberty of France alone but the liberty of mankind. The liberty of the French people, yes; but the liberty also of the German people. I am just as much in favor of giving liberty to the German people as I am to the French people. We can not give liberty to one and take it away from another and establish the divine doctrine of peace and good will on earth. The thing that men are willing to live for and to fight and die for is "liberty." It ought not to be put upon a sordid plane.

Nothing which I said showed any lack of sympathy for the French people. I have the greatest sympathy for the French people. I wish I could believe that the French people had a greater measure of democratic self-government. In my judgment they are being largely governed now by an organized commercial, military, and political force which is leading them and the world into injury and harm.

From their recent gestures I can not help thinking that the military leadership of France is dictating the economic policy of France. However, whether that be true or not, it is my judgment that it is an injury to the people of the United States that this controversy between the French leadership and the German leadership should remain unsettled and that war should grow out of it.

It is not a question of sympathizing with the unborn babe of France or the unborn babe of Germany or the unborn babe of the United States; but it is a question of establishing by orderly processes a means by which men shall live at peace, and the first fundamental of that principle requires the recognition of the doctrine of the territorial integrity and political independence of each self-governing nation. When we depart from that principle we set the world on fire.

I feel entirely justified in what I said with regard to the invasion of the Ruhr. I hope, indeed, that time may prove that our grave apprehensions are not well founded.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhues, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35 to the said bill and concurred therein severally with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, grant the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

STREET CAR FARES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going to address myself to the pending bill, and if there is any other Senator on the floor who would like to speak upon the bill I will yield.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I really wanted to speak this afternoon on the pending bill, but on account of the lateness of the hour I prefer not to do so at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to an article published in this morning's Washington Post, which I will read:

WOULD WELCOME COURT FARE TEST—UTILITIES COMMISSION DECLARES THAT CHALLENGE OF ITS POWERS WOULD BE ACCEPTABLE. CRITICS ILL ADVISED, IT SAYS—KELLER CONTENDS ACT CREATING COMMISSION SUPERSEDED OLD CONGRESSIONAL CHARTERS TO COMPANIES.

Challenge in the courts of the power of the District Public Utilities Commission to fix street-car fares at the point which yields a fair return on the value of the property, even though such fare is above the 5-cent fare specified in the old congressional charters of the street-car companies, will be welcomed by the commission, Engineer Commissioner Keller, chairman of the commission, said yesterday.

Criticism of the commission for its action in permitting the street-car companies to charge the present fare of 8 cents or six tokens for 40 cents, voiced recently in the Senate by Senator McKELLAR and others, commission officials declare is not based on a full knowledge of the facts or a fair estimation of the duties of the commission.

KELLER REELECTED CHAIRMAN.

Commissioner Keller yesterday was reelected chairman of the utilities commission by the commissioners at a board meeting. Commissioner Rudolph praised the work of Commissioner Keller as chairman of the commission since his appointment as engineer commissioner of the District. Commissioner Rudolph took occasion to rebuke critics of the commission. Most of the criticism came from lack of public information as to the commission's functions, its limitations, and its actions, he said.

The utilities commission has been advised by its legal adviser, Commissioner Keller said, that the act creating it superseded the old congressional charters of local street-car companies and that the commission is directed to fix rates to be charged by the utilities companies. Present rates are designed to yield only a fair rate of return on the value of the street-car properties, he said.

NO PROSPECT OF FARE CUT.

In the face of decreased revenue accruing to the companies because of a drop in the number of passengers carried, there is at the present time no prospect of a decrease in car fares unless there is a material decrease in operating expenses, Commissioner Keller said.

Any action which will result in decreased fares will be welcomed, he said, but under existing conditions it would be foolish for the commission to fix a rate of fare too low, the result of which would be contest in the courts by the companies, with the preponderance of evidence in favor of a decision against the commission.

Mr. President, during the day I have had occasion to look into the facts and circumstances under which the Public Utilities Commission of this District was created in the year 1912.

I have a copy of the act before me. I want to call attention first to the fact that the very power which Commissioner Keller said the commission had was offered to be put into the original act, but was not put in that act. I read from the RECORD of March 8, 1912, from a speech made by former Senator Works, of California:

Section 91, as it appeared in the bill prepared by the corporation council, is omitted from the pending bill. That section provided:

"Sec. 91. That the commission shall have power, when deemed by it necessary to prevent injury to the business or interests of the public or the business or interests of any public utility of the District of Columbia, in case of any emergency, to be judged of by the commission, to temporarily alter, amend, or with the consent of the public utility concerned, suspend any existing rates, schedules, and order relating to or affecting any public utility or part of any public utility within said District. Such rates so made by the commission shall apply to one or more of the public utilities in said District, or to any portion thereof, as may be directed by the commission, and shall take effect at such time and remain in force for such length of time as may be prescribed by the commission."

That was stricken out and is not a part of the law.

Again, another section that was left out of the measure then before the Senate was section 106, which read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the commission in fixing and determining rates, in directing extensions and improvements, and in general when making requirements under the provisions of this act that involve expenditures by or lessen the receipts of public utilities, and notwithstanding any other of the provisions of this act, having in mind the public interest, to require the utmost of the public utility that will not trench upon its constitutional right to earn a fair net return upon the fair value of the property used for the convenience of the public.

That provision was left out of the present law and is not there. I have read the act. There is nothing in the act that provides for a reasonable or fair return upon the property of the company, as stated by the commissioners. It is possible that under the construction which has been offered there are some paragraphs of the law under which such a strained construction might be had. But the specific power to fix rates in order to bring a fair and reasonable return on the money invested is nowhere to be found in the act; at all events I have not been able to find it.

Now, why is it not there? It is because when the act was passed a very different condition existed. The law was enacted in 1912. Prior to that time there had been a great demand in the country, in all the cities of the country, for reduced street-car fares. It will be remembered it was about that time that Tom Johnson had put a 3-cent fare in operation in Cleveland, Ohio.

I think similar provision had been made in Detroit, Mich. In many cities a 3-cent fare had been put in operation. Washington wanted a lower fare. At the time there was a 5-cent fare under the charter, or six tickets for a quarter. Washington was not pleased with that condition. In addition to that there was a demand for free transfers. We had two companies, possibly several at that time which have since been consolidated practically into two companies. There was a demand for free transfers between the two companies. Citizens of the District believed that the Public Utilities Commission would bring about that condition. In looking over the arguments which were then presented, I find that it was said in behalf of the bill that if it were enacted into law it would result in a universal system of free transfers and would result in lower or cheaper fares in the end. That was the argument made. But let me show why it has not been done under the commission.

I read from page 3028 of the RECORD of March 8, 1912. I am still reading from the speech by former Senator Works, of California, who offered a substitute for the then pending bill. By the way, the measure was introduced and put through by former Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire. He was in charge of the bill. I now read:

MR. WORKS. The Senator from New Hampshire has spoken now a number of times about a conference that was held with respect to this bill. I would like to ask who was present and took part in that conference at the time he says the commissioners consented to these changes being made?

MR. GALLINGER. The commissioners were present, or the engineer commissioner, who represented them, was present.

MR. WORKS. Was anybody present representing the utility corporations?

MR. GALLINGER. Yes.

MR. WORKS. What corporations?

MR. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I am not going to be interrogated by the Senator from California. I did consult the utility corporations. I think they are entitled to consideration. The Senator from California may hold a different view. The railroad corporations were consulted. Mr. Hamilton, on the part of the Capital Traction Co., was present; Mr. King was present a few moments on the part of the Washington Railway & Electric Co.; and Mr. Goldsborough was present on the part of the Washington Gas Light Co. They were invited there by me; they were consulted; and, to their credit be it said, Mr. President, they did not object to a public utilities bill, saying that they wanted it to be an adequate bill, one that was workable and one that would accomplish the results that they knew the chairman of the committee, at least, had in view. They were consulted. The Maryland statute as to ascertaining values seemed to the committee to be adequate; but, in addition to that, there is a provision in this bill that if the commission has any doubt as to the elements of value they can go to the court and ascertain the opinion of the court on that subject.

It was after that conference between the committee and the presidents of the various public-utility corporations that the utility companies withdrew their opposition to the Public Utility Commission bill and became its advocates, after it had been arranged to suit them, and in that way the bill was enacted into law. I call attention especially to this language:

MR. President, they did not object to a public utilities bill, saying they wanted it to be an adequate bill, one that was workable.

Well, they got one that was adequate for them and that was workable. There is no doubt in the world about that. The gentlemen knew what they were doing. Others thought, I think the great body of Congress then thought, judging from what I have read of the debates, that they had a law under which the Public Utilities Commission would represent the people of the District and would reduce fares and bring about a system of free transfers. But when those gentlemen examined the measure and offered certain amendments which were agreed to by the committee, they made a "workable bill and one that brought about adequate results," to use the language of Senator Gallinger. The adequate result has been that under the law, which was introduced and enacted with the distinct purpose of lowering car-fare rates in the District, that there has been a very opposite effect, and under a usurpation of authority, as I believe, the Public Utilities Commission have raised the fares to the present exorbitant rate on the theory that they are instructed somewhere in the law to fix such rates as would bring to the companies a reasonable and fair return on the money invested. That provision, as I said, was left out of the law. It was specifically and intentionally omitted from the law and nowhere occurs in it.

Here are some of the provisions of the act to which I wish to call attention. Paragraph 2 of the law provides as follows:

PAR. 2. That every public utility doing business within the District of Columbia is required to furnish service and facilities reasonably safe and adequate and in all respects just and reasonable. The charge made by any such public utility for any facility or services furnished or rendered, or to be furnished or rendered, shall be reasonable, just, and nondiscriminatory. Every unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory charge for such facility or service is prohibited and is hereby declared unlawful. Every public utility is hereby required to obey the lawful orders of the commission created by this section.

I next quote from paragraph 38, as follows:

PAR. 38. That upon its own initiative or upon reasonable complaint made against any public utility that any of the rates, tolls, charges, or schedules, or services, or time and conditions of payment, or any joint rate or rates, schedules, or services, are in any respect unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or that any time schedule, regulation, or act whatsoever affecting or relating to the conduct of any street railway or common carrier, or the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, or any service in connection therewith, or the conveyance of any telegraph or telephone message, or any service in connection therewith, is in any respect unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory, or that any service is inadequate or can not be obtained, the commission may, in its discretion, proceed, with or without notice, to make such investigation as it may deem necessary or convenient. But no order affecting said rates, tolls, charges, schedules, regulations, or act complained of shall be entered by the commission without a formal hearing.

PAR. 42. That if upon investigation it shall be found that any rate, toll, charge, schedule, or joint rate, or rates, is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory or preferential, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, or that any time schedule, regulation, act, or service complained of is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, preferential, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, or if it be found that reasonable service is not supplied, the public utility found to be at fault shall pay the expenses incurred by the commission upon such investigation.

That does not apply to the power to increase rates, which is now assumed, to give the companies a reasonable return on the money invested. If there is any such power there, it is purely by implication. My judgment is the commission have gone beyond the powers conferred in the act.

I come now to the next paragraph which touches on the subject:

PAR. 63. That all rates, tolls, charges, time, and condition of payment thereof, schedules, and joint rates fixed by the commission shall be in force and shall be prima facie reasonable until finally found otherwise in an action brought for that purpose.

And again:

PAR. 90. That the commission shall inquire into any neglect or violation of the laws or regulations in force in the District of Columbia by any public utility doing business therein, or by the officers, agents, or employees thereof, or by any person operating the plant of any public utility, and shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to enforce the provisions of this section as well as all other laws relating to public utilities.

There is no question about the law being in existence as between the street-car companies and the Government in reference to the fare to be charged. It must be remembered that the act of Congress gave these companies the right to operate in the city of Washington; that it granted easements in real estate—granted them valuable rights—rights that they would not think for a moment of giving up in return for the 6-cent fare or six tickets for a quarter.

Now, I find probably the provision under which the commission is acting. It is paragraph 101 of the act which provides:

That, except as modified or changed by this section—

What the word "section" means I do not know. I hardly understand to what it applies; it is ambiguous, in the first place. If it means this paragraph, then it is meaningless, but it says "section" while there are no sections in the act. The paragraph reads:

PAR. 101. That, except as modified or changed by this section and until modified or changed under its provisions, all charters, statutes, laws, ordinances, and regulations now in force shall remain and continue to be in full force and effect until altered, amended, or repealed according to law: Provided, That all charters, statutes, acts, and parts of acts, laws, ordinances, and regulations inconsistent and repugnant to the provisions of this section, and only so far as inconsistent and repugnant thereto, are hereby repealed.

MR. NORRIS. Mr. President—

MR. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

MR. NORRIS. Merely for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the RECORD may be clarified, I desire to say that I noticed all the way through the act, before the Senator from Tennessee called attention to the fact, that reference is made to "this section." I wish to ask the Senator, Was not the entire so-called utilities act passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill?

MR. McKELLAR. That is the only way it may be explained. It is true it was passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

MR. NORRIS. The whole act is a section, and in order to prevent conflict and the duplication of sections, the framers of the act referred to the different divisions as "paragraphs." I am not sure that that is right, but I think it is; and that the Senator from Tennessee will find that the entire provision is one section divided up into separate paragraphs.

MR. McKELLAR. I find upon examination that this entire bill was added to one of the appropriation bills in 1912. Points of order were at first made against it. I suppose some Senator did not know of the arrangement which had been made by those who were in charge of the bill, and therefore it was objected to. I remember the then Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Oliver, raised a point of order, and the amendment was about to go out upon the point of order, but upon the situation being explained to him, he withdrew the point of order and the amendment was adopted. I have no doubt that the word "section" refers possibly to the whole bill.

Now, having referred to the former Senator from Pennsylvania, I wish to quote from him as showing what was the purpose of the bill. I quote from page 3026 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1912, as follows:

MR. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

In addressing my inquiry to the Senator from California, I did not intend to allude to either his substitute or the bill proposed by the committee as drastic in its nature, but I want to elicit some information as to the real necessity in the District of Columbia for legislation of this sort. I was a member of the subcommittee which passed upon the bill, and I am cordially in favor of it, but I am not strongly impressed with the absolute necessity for any legislation of this kind.

In other words, the Senator from Pennsylvania thought that a 5-cent fare, with six tickets for 25 cents, was not unreasonable, and that it ought not to be reduced. He looked at it from the corporation standpoint. He honestly believed that a corporation ought to be treated with liberality; that the fares then in existence were not too high; and, therefore, he was not impressed with the necessity for the legislation. I continue to quote from him, as follows:

It was with a view of ascertaining the necessity for it or the demand for it that I interrogated the Senator from California.

I know, Mr. President, that when the universal-transfer bill, which we passed here a short time ago and which is now pending in the House, becomes a law, any man can ride from any one part of the District to another for a nickel. I have in my house here in Washington a telephone service consisting of a line of four branches, for which I pay less than half the amount that I pay in Pittsburgh for a line with only three branches in my residence there. I also know of another instance. In the little town in which I live in the summer in Canada, where I have still smaller service, I pay 50 per cent more for it than I pay for the service here in Washington.

The former Senator from Pennsylvania was arguing the company's side of the case; in other words, that the fares ought not to be reduced, as it was believed that the Public Utilities Commission would reduce them if the bill were passed and, as was claimed to be its purpose, to give to the people of Washington the same low rates of fare on street cars which other cities enjoyed at that time. I continue the reading, as follows:

I do not believe that there is any strong, necessitous demand for legislation of this kind in the District such as there undoubtedly is in the different States. The inhabitants of many of our States have for years been oppressed by exorbitant railroad rates and by the discrimination in rates from one district or one town as against another. The necessity for such legislation in the States has existed and is being satisfied by legislation passed year after year. There is no such strong necessity for it in the District, but whatever evils may exist I think will be cured by the bill as proposed by the committee. If it is found from experience that the provisions need to be strengthened they can be added to from time to time.

There has been no addition to it and it was not necessary for Congress to make additions, for the Public Utilities Commission, acting always, or substantially always, in the interest of the utility companies, have constantly boosted the rate at every opportunity afforded; and they have usurped power that Congress did not intend they should have in order to effectuate that purpose. Now they come back and answer the criticism directed against them for having continued to raise rates by saying "Congress permitted it; Congress passed such a law, and action was taken accordingly."

Mr. President, while I am on that subject I wish to say that the original public utilities bill was submitted by the late Senator Gallinger to the late Hon. Franklin K. Lane for his suggestions. Mr. Lane suggested that the very thing that has happened would happen. He said that the measure was so long and complicated that no one could tell what it meant and that that kind of legislation was always dangerous.

It was also submitted to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who, I think, was on the committee, and in criticism of it he said, instead of it being a bill in the interest of lower rates, it gave such power to the commission that it would depend entirely upon the commission, and that he was afraid it would have exactly the opposite effect from what was intended by the Congress. As a matter of fact, Senator CUMMINS was entirely right, for it has had exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended. I continue to quote:

But there is danger in passing legislation of this kind of overdoing it, of discouraging men from investing their money in these public-utilities concerns. I do not believe that we ought rashly to rush into legislation which is calculated to retard progress in such affairs or to keep men of capital from putting their money and their time into these enterprises and prevent giving to them the benefit of their experience.

Ah, Mr. President, the then Senator from Pennsylvania evidently did not know that amendments had been offered having the approval of the heads of the utility corporations, and that, under them, the corporations could be given the right, or that the commission would assume power from the act, by which and through which the people of the District of Columbia would be exploited in the way they have been exploited in the interest of the public-utility corporations; but they have been so exploited.

So, Mr. President, I submit that the Public Utilities Commission have not, as they now claim, specific authority to raise rates in order to produce a fair return on the money invested. Instead of being in the bill such a provision was offered as an amendment, but was rejected. Of course, the intent of the Congress was plain that it was never intended to give them that power, and yet so long as I have been in the District the principal power exercised by the Public Utilities Commission has been so to control rates, not only street-car rates, but gas rates, electric rates, telephone rates, telegraph rates, and all other public-utility rates, as to produce the greatest return to the utilities companies.

I notice that some member of the commission spoke too quickly when he offered to resign, for, after saying that if the activities of the Public Utilities Commission were not satisfactory, he would resign, he was reelected as president of the Public Utilities Commission, and he, or some other member of the commission, immediately gave out a statement not only defending the commission but defending the street-car companies in whose interest they have been legislating all this time.

I call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that the vote which was taken here yesterday in connection with this question was a vote of lack of confidence in the Public Utilities Commission, for a majority of those who are to serve here after the 4th of March voted against the commission. It seems to me that if the commission had the self-respect that they ought to have they would resign and turn matters over to others. We know the history of this commission. All the time it has operated it has done so for the benefit of the public-utility companies and against the interests of the city. A man who undertakes to represent the citizens of Washington, the users of public utilities, and does it in the manner in which it has been done in this instance, calls down upon his head condemnation.

Mr. President, I wanted to call the attention of the Senate at this time to these facts, to the law and to the history of the Public Utilities Commission. I hope that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the chairman of the District Committee, will have occasion to offer a measure of some kind in behalf of the city of Washington before the 4th of March, and I hope he will offer a measure restoring the 5-cent fare and six tickets for 25 cents. However, if he will just offer any kind of legislation and ask that it be passed, I will again propose an amendment fixing the charter rates; and thereby, if we will but cooperate, we can secure for the citizens of Washington this reduced rate of fare to which they are justly entitled.

In saying what I have said, it can not be said that I wish to be harsh in any way to the utility companies, because, according to their own reports, published in our papers, one of them is making something like 13 per cent on its capital stock by reason of this large increase of fares, and the other is paying more than reasonable dividends upon watered stock and making more than a reasonable income on the amount actually invested by it.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on January 26, 1923, the President approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property during the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine in the District of Columbia June 5, 6, and 7, 1923, and for other purposes.

USE OF AUTOMOBILES BY DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the first page of the RECORD of to-day. I am glad that the chairman of the District Committee, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], is here. I want him to hear what I have to say about it, and I hope he will introduce some measure that will change the situation.

I call attention to the large number of policemen who are being given automobiles by the city government. I find here 17 privates of the police department who are each furnished $40 a month for the upkeep of an automobile—I suppose their own automobile. Some one wanted to know how the policemen were going to get around. I will read how they get around. Congress in 1916 passed this law for the benefit of the police. I quote:

The several street-railway companies in the District of Columbia are authorized and required to transport free of charge all members of the Metropolitan police force, crossing police, park police, and fire department of the District of Columbia, when in uniform and in the performance of their duties.

Is not that an answer to the question that was asked me as to how they were to get around when I opposed the appropriation for these very policemen and tried to get it stricken out of the bill? Is it possible that our private policemen can not get around over the city in free street cars furnished by law? Why should we furnish them automobiles?

I stop here long enough to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, whom I see sitting before me, upon what theory can it be claimed that we should furnish money to operate automobiles for private policemen to get around over the city when they have the right under the law to use the street cars without charge? I am waiting. If the Senator will give me a reason I shall be glad to hear it, because I really think this is a matter of importance.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I can easily see why they should need to go to certain parts of the city in automobiles. I was not paying attention to the first part of the Senator's question, so I can not answer it definitely. I will state that as a general principle the committee is opposed to allowing people to furnish their own automobiles and allowing them so much per month to take care of them. I do not know whether that is the feature the Senator is speaking of or not, but that was permitted to go into the bill because we did not feel that at this time we could furnish new automobiles to supply the number required without a very great addition to the appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I find here that 36 policemen in the city of Washington are furnished automobiles by the Government. Those are the passenger automobiles that are furnished by the city to these officers and clerks and others who are connected with the department. In addition to that, here are 17 private policemen, commonly called patrolmen—men who walk, men who have free car fares furnished by the Congress—who are furnished with $40 a month for the upkeep of their automobiles.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BALL. One statement will answer all of his inquiries. A certain number of automobiles and a certain number of motor cycles certainly are necessary for the police if they ever expect to arrest the breakers of the law. If the policemen attempted to follow them through their various courses by riding on the trolley cars, they certainly would not accomplish the intent of having policemen.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh! Then, as I understand, these 17 privates are furnished automobiles so that they can catch up with the criminals? Is that the idea?

Mr. BALL. The intent of the police is to preserve law and order, and unless they arrest criminals they certainly are not preserving order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; but I can not understand why patrolmen should be furnished with money to run automobiles. If all of the machines that are enumerated here are used by the police and are used to run down criminals, no wonder we have had so many accidents in the city. It seems to me that they would add very materially to the accidents. I do not see why it is necessary that a patrolman—a man who is on a beat—should be furnished with an automobile in which to patrol his beat.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I recall, at one time we had what were called mounted police. It may be that instead of being mounted now they are given automobiles. Perhaps that is the explanation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so. If that is the rule, however, if that is what we are going to do, if we are going to furnish our police force with automobiles, I want to protest in behalf of the other patrolmen who do not have automobiles. I do not think it is fair to give 17 patrolmen automobiles and deprive the rest of them of automobiles. Why should we not give them to all of them? What reason is there for denying one patrolman an automobile if we give them to 17? Why should we not give them all automobiles? Why should we not promote the use of automobiles simply by furnishing money for their upkeep and maintenance to all the patrolmen? Why is there discrimination?

It seems to me that we ought to be fair to all these policemen, and that all those who have not automobiles ought to be equipped with automobiles. If it is necessary for each patrolman to have an automobile in which to run down criminals, by every rule of fairness we ought to equip them all with automobiles.

It just shows what a ridiculous position we have reached when we are furnishing these passenger automobiles to the police force and to clerks and other employees in the city of Washington. We appropriate $216,000 merely for the upkeep for one year of passenger automobiles furnished to the clerks and employees of the Washington city government. Why, Mr. President, if we were to furnish Senators and Representatives automobiles in the same way that we furnish them to the employees of the city government of Washington, the people would turn three-fourths of us out of office—practically all of us who voted for any such proposition; and yet, while we do not do it for ourselves because we know that it is improper and know that it is not right and know that it is not necessary, we let these provisions come in here in the form of lump-sum appropriations by which this willful and wasteful extravagance is carried on here in the city. I again protest against it.

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, several Senators are of the opinion that under the present status it will be necessary to offer amendments as we go along with the reading of the bill. To remove any misunderstanding, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read for amendment, the committee amendment to be disposed of first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? We met this morning at 11 o'clock. We have been meeting quite early and running pretty late. This is Saturday. I understand that there is but one committee amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I think that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator intend to adjourn after we have disposed of that?

Mr. LENROOT. If we could complete the formal reading of the bill and the disposal of that committee amendment, I should not ask for anything further to-night.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, it will then be in order to offer amendments, after it is disposed of?

Mr. LENROOT. To any part of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Banking and Currency were, on page 14, after line 22, to strike out:

SEC. 9. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And to insert:

SEC. 9. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, and subject to regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may discount or purchase bills of exchange payable at sight or on demand which are drawn to finance the domestic shipment of nonperishable, readily marketable, staple agricultural products, and are secured by bills of lading or other shipping documents conveying or securing title to such staples: Provided, however, That all such bills of exchange shall be forwarded promptly for collection, and demand for payment shall be made with reasonable promptness after the arrival of such staples at their destination: Provided further, That no such bill shall in any event be held by or for the account of a Federal reserve bank for a period in excess of 90 days. In discounting such bills Federal reserve banks may compute the interest to be deducted on the basis of the estimated life of each bill and adjust the discount after payment of such bills to conform to the actual life thereof."

SEC. 10. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the fourth paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And on page 16 to change the number of the section from 10 to 11, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act the term "Federal farm loan act" means the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, as amended, and the "Federal reserve act" means the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, as amended.

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the Federal farm loan act is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE I.

"SECTION 1. That this act may be cited as the 'Federal farm loan act.' Its administration shall be under the direction and control of the Federal Farm Loan Board hereinafter created."

SEC. 3. That the Federal farm loan act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new title, to read as follows:

"TITLE II.

"SEC. 201. That, in addition to the powers granted by Title I, each Federal land bank shall have power—

"(a) Subject solely to such restrictions, limitations, and conditions as may be imposed by the Federal Farm Loan Board not inconsistent with the provisions of this act (1) to discount for, or purchase from, any national bank, State bank, trust company, rural credit corporation, incorporated live-stock loan or farm credit company, savings institution, cooperative bank, or cooperative credit or marketing association of agricultural producers organized under the laws of any State, or for any other Federal land bank, with its indorsement, any note, draft, bill of exchange, debenture, or other such obligation the proceeds of which have been advanced or used in the first instance for an agricultural purpose or for the raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of live stock; (2) to buy or sell, with or without recourse, debentures issued by any other Federal land banks; and (3) to make loans or advances direct to any cooperative association organized under the laws of any State or the United States and composed of persons engaged in producing, or producing and marketing, staple agricultural products or live stock, if the notes or other such obligations representing such loans are secured by warehouse receipts, and/or shipping documents covering such products, and/or by mortgages on live stock: Provided, That no Federal land bank shall discount paper for any national bank, State bank, or trust company which already has bills rediscounted equal to or exceeding the amount permitted by such bank or trust company under the laws of the jurisdiction creating the same: And provided further, That no paper shall be discounted for any agricultural credit corporation, incorporated live-stock loan company, or farm credit company which has rediscounted paper equal to or exceeding ten times the paid-up capital stock and surplus of such company: And provided further, That if the laws of any jurisdiction under which any bank or trust company receiving demand deposits is created do not impose a limit upon the rediscount privilege of such bank or trust company, then no paper shall be rediscounted for such bank or trust company which has already rediscounted paper equal to or exceeding five times its paid-up capital stock and surplus. Such loans or discounts must have a maturity at the time they are made or discounted by the Federal land bank of not less than six months nor more than three years. Any Federal land bank may in its discretion sell loans or discounts made under this subdivision, with or without its indorsement. Rates of interest or discount charged by the Federal land banks upon such loans and discounts shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"(b) Subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board to issue and to sell collateral trust debentures or other such obligations with a maturity at the time of issue of not more than five years, which shall be secured by at least a like face amount of cash or notes or other such obligations discounted or purchased or representing loans made under subdivision (a): Provided, That no Federal land bank shall have power to issue or obligate itself for debentures or other obligations under the provisions of this section in excess of ten times the amount of the paid-up capital and surplus of the farm credits department of such bank established under this act. The provisions of Title I relating to the preparation and issue of farm-loan bonds shall, so far as applicable, govern the preparation and issue of debentures or other such obligations issued under this subdivision; but the Federal Farm Loan Board shall prescribe rules and regulations governing the receipt, custody, substitution, and release of collateral instruments securing such debentures or other obligations, the right of substitution being hereby granted. Such collateral shall be held separate and distinct from the collateral securing farm-loan bonds and may be classified in such manner as the Federal Farm Loan Board shall approve and debentures issued upon the basis of such classes of paper. Rates of interest upon debentures and other such obligations issued under this subdivision shall, subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, be fixed by the Federal land bank making the issue.

"Sec. 202. That before making any discounts under the provisions of this act, each Federal land bank shall establish and promulgate a rate of discount to be approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board. Any Federal land bank which has made an issue of debentures under the provisions of this act may thereafter establish, with the approval of the Farm Loan Board, a rate of discount not exceeding by more than 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by its last preceding issue of debentures.

"No bank, trust company, live-stock company, or other agencies entitled to the privileges of this act shall, without the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, be allowed to discount any note or other obligation upon which the original borrower has been charged a rate of interest exceeding by more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum the discount rate of the Federal land bank at the time such loan was made.

"A Federal land bank may, subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, buy in the open market for its own account and retire at or before maturity any such debentures or obligations issued by it.

"Sec. 203. That for the purpose of exercising the powers conferred by this title each Federal land bank shall establish and operate under the supervision of its temporary directors and, after the establishment of the permanent organization, under the supervision of its district directors, a separate department to be designated as the farm credits department, for which $5,000,000 in capital shall be subscribed before any of the powers so conferred may be exercised. Capital stock of such amount shall be divided into shares of $5 each and shall be subscribed, held, and paid by the Government of the United States. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe to such capital stock on behalf of the United States, such subscription to be subject to call in whole or in part by the temporary or district directors of the Federal land bank upon 30 days' notice to the Secretary of the Treasury and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to take out shares as called and to pay for the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Capital so allocated to a farm credits department and the surplus earnings of such department shall be applied solely to meet obligations and losses, if any, incurred in the operation of that department; and the capital subscribed, together with the reserve and accumulations from earnings under Title I, shall not be applied to meeting obligations or losses, if any, incurred in the operation of any farm credits department.

"If at any time the capital stock provided for in the first paragraph of this section shall be found by the Federal Farm Loan Board to be insufficient to enable any farm credits department in a Federal land bank to meet the credit needs of the agricultural and live-stock industries in its district, intended to be served by the facilities provided under Title II of this act, such capital shall, upon application of the Federal Farm Loan Board, if approved by the President of the United States, be increased by an amount not to exceed $5,000,000 and thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe such additional capital on behalf of the United States, in the same manner as he subscribed the original capital of such farm credits department, and such increase in capital shall be subject to the same uses and conditions as apply to the original capital. Shares of such increased capital stock held by the United States in the farm credits department of any Federal land bank may, at any time, when the capital is found to be needlessly large, be redeemed and retired at par upon the application for such retirement by the district directors of such Federal land bank with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"Sec. 204. That the Federal Farm Loan Board shall equitably apportion the joint expenses incurred by the farm mortgage department operating under Title I of this act and the farm credits department operating under Title II of this act in each Federal land bank, and shall assess against the farm credits department of each Federal land bank in proportion to the capital and reserve of such department its proportionate share of the expenses of any additional personnel in the Farm Loan Bureau made necessary in connection with the operation of this provision. After all expenses of the farm credits department have been met out of earnings of that department the capital stock held by the Government of the United States shall be entitled to a dividend of 4 per cent per annum, which dividend shall be cumulative. After the aforesaid claims have been fully met the remaining earnings shall be paid into a surplus fund until such fund shall equal $2,000,000, and thereafter 25 per cent of the annual net earnings shall be paid to the Government of the United States in retirement of the stock owned by it until the stock of any farm credits department shall be reduced to $1,000,000.

"Sec. 205. That the farm-credits department of any Federal land bank issuing debentures or other such obligations under section 201 shall be primarily liable therefor, and shall also be liable upon presentation of the coupons for interest payments due upon any such debentures or obligations issued by the farm-credits department of any other Federal land bank and remaining unpaid in consequence of the default of the farm-credits department of such other Federal land bank. The farm-credits department of any Federal land bank shall likewise be liable for such portion of the principal of debentures or obligations so issued as are not paid after the assets of the farm-credits department of such other Federal land bank have been liquidated and distributed. Such losses, if any, either of interest or of principal, shall be assessed by the Federal Farm Loan Board against solvent farm-credits departments of Federal land banks liable therefor in proportion to the amount of debentures or other such obligations which each may have outstanding at the time of such assessment. Every Federal land bank shall, by appropriate action of its board of directors duly recorded in its minutes, obligate its farm-credits department to become liable on debentures and other such obligations as provided in this section.

"Sec. 206. That in order to enable each Federal land bank to carry out the purpose of this act, the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized and directed, upon the request of any Federal land bank, (a) to furnish for the confidential use of such bank such reports, records, and other information as he may have available relating to the financial condition of national banks and rural-credit corporations through or for which the Federal land bank has made or contemplates making discounts, and (b) to make, through his examiners, for the confidential use of the Federal land bank, examinations of State banks, trust companies, or savings institutions, rural-credit corporations through or for which the Federal land bank has made or contemplates making discounts or loans: Provided, That no such examination shall be made without the consent of such State bank, trust company, savings institution, or agricultural-credit corporation except where such examination is required by law. Land-bank appraisers are authorized, upon the request of any Federal land bank and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to investigate and make a written report upon the products covered by warehouse receipts, shipping documents, and the live stock covered by mortgages which are security for notes or other such obligations representing any loan to any cooperative association, live-stock loan company, or farm-credit company, under subdivision (a) of section 201. Land-bank examiners are authorized, upon the request of any Federal land bank and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to examine and make a written report upon the condition of any cooperative association, live-stock loan company, or farm-credit company to which the Federal land bank contemplates making any such loan.

"Sec. 207. That the Federal Farm Loan Board is authorized to make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as it deems necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this title.

"Sec. 208. The penalties provided for in section 31 of Title I of this act shall apply to all false statements, counterfeiting of debentures or credit papers, and other fraudulent acts and misdemeanors against the farm-credits department, as well as against the farm-mortgage department of Federal land banks, and the penalty provided for overvaluation of land as security shall apply to overvaluation of live stock or other farm products for the purpose of securing a loan, advance, or discount from the farm-credits department of any Federal land bank.

"Sec. 209. The privileges of tax exemption accorded under Title I, section 26, of this act shall apply also to the farm-credits department of each Federal land bank, including its capital, reserve or surplus, and the income derived therefrom, and the debentures issued under Title II of this act shall enjoy the same tax exemptions as are accorded farm-loan bonds in said section."

"Sec. 4. That the first two lines of section 12 of the Federal farm loan act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 12. That no Federal land bank organized under this act shall make loans other than those authorized by Title II, except upon the following terms and conditions:"

"Sec. 5. That section 23 of the Federal farm loan act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to the earnings, surplus, and capital stock of the farm-credits department of any Federal land bank."

"Sec. 6. That section 5202 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Eighth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 201 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended."

"Sec. 7. That paragraph 1 of section 7 of the Federal reserve act be amended by striking out all of said paragraph and substituting the following:

"After all necessary expenses of a Federal reserve bank have been paid or provided for the stockholders shall be entitled to receive an annual dividend of 6 per cent on the paid-in capital stock, which dividend shall be cumulative and may be paid out of any surplus in excess of 100 per cent of subscribed capital. Out of any net earnings remaining after the aforesaid dividend and surplus claims have been fully met there shall be paid each year to the United States as a franchise tax such an amount as will make the aggregate amount so paid for the year 1922 and subsequent years equal to the aggregate amount of the cumulative dividends paid to the stockholding member banks for such years. After the full amount of the franchise tax shall have been paid to the United States the balance of the net earnings of any year shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 100 per cent of subscribed capital, and thereafter when net earnings exceed 12 per cent an extra dividend of not to exceed 3 per cent may be distributed to the stockholders, and the remaining net earnings, if any, shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax."

"Sec. 8. That the ninth paragraph of section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended to read as follows:

"No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses paid-up, unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national bank act: Provided, however, That an applying bank organized in a place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be admitted to membership if it possesses a paid-up, unimpaired capital of at least $30,000 and if the application is accompanied by adequate undertakings of such bank and of its principal stockholders that the capital of such bank will within three years be increased to $50,000: And provided further, That an applying bank organized in a place the population of which does not exceed 3,000 inhabitants may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be admitted to membership if it possesses a paid-up, unimpaired capital of at least $15,000 and if it is accompanied by adequate undertakings of such bank and of its principal stockholders that such capital will within three years be increased to $25,000. If any such undertakings have not been fulfilled within three years, the Federal Reserve Board may forbid such bank to enjoy any of the privileges of this act, and may require it to withdraw forthwith from membership in the Federal reserve system."

Sec. 9. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, and subject to regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may discount or purchase bills of exchange payable at sight or on demand which are drawn to finance the domestic shipment of non-perishable, readily marketable staple agricultural products and are secured by bills of lading or other shipping documents conveying or securing title to such staples: Provided, however, That all such bills of exchange shall be forwarded promptly for collection, and demand for payment shall be made with reasonable promptness after the arrival of such staples at their destination: Provided further, That no such bill shall in any event be held by or for the account of a Federal reserve bank for a period in excess of 90 days. In discounting such bills Federal reserve banks may compute the interest to be deducted on the basis of the estimated life of each bill and adjust the discount after payment of such bills to conform to the actual life thereof."

Sec. 10. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the fourth paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Any Federal reserve bank may discount acceptances of the kinds hereinafter described, which have a maturity at the time of discount of not more than 90 days' sight, exclusive of days of grace, and which are indorsed by at least one member bank: Provided, That such acceptances if drawn for an agricultural purpose and secured at the time of acceptance by warehouse receipts or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples may be discounted with a maturity at the time of discount of not more than six months' sight, exclusive of days of grace."

Sec. 11. That the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end of section 13 a new section, to be numbered section 13a, and to read as follows:

"Sec. 13a. Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose, or based upon live stock, and have a maturity, at the time of discount, exclusive of days of grace, not exceeding nine months: Provided, however, That notes, drafts, and bills of exchange with maturities in excess of six months shall not be eligible as a basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes unless secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents conveying or securing title to readily marketable staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgage upon live stock which is being fattened for market."

"That any Federal reserve bank may rediscount such notes, drafts, and bills for any Federal land bank, except that no Federal reserve bank shall rediscount for a Federal land bank any such note or obligation which bears the indorsement of a nonmember State bank or trust company which is eligible for membership in the Federal reserve system, in accordance with section 9 of the Federal reserve act."

"Notes, drafts, or bills of exchange issued or drawn by cooperating marketing associations composed of producers of agricultural products shall be deemed to have been issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose, within the meaning of this section, if the proceeds thereof have been or are to be advanced by such association to any members thereof for an agricultural purpose, or have been or are to be used by such association in making payments to any members thereof on account of agricultural products delivered by such members to the association, or if such proceeds have been or are to be used by such association to meet expenditures incurred or to be incurred by the association in connection with the grading, processing, packing, preparation for market, or marketing of any agricultural product handled by such association for any of its members: Provided, however, That the express enumeration in this paragraph of certain classes of paper of cooperative marketing associations as eligible for rediscount shall not be construed as rendering ineligible any other class of paper of such associations which is now eligible for rediscount."

"The Federal Reserve Board may, by regulation, limit to a percentage of the assets of a Federal reserve bank the amount of notes, drafts, acceptances, or bills having a maturity in excess of three months, but not exceeding six months, exclusive of days of grace, which may be discounted by such bank, and the amount of notes, drafts, bills, or acceptances having a maturity in excess of six months, but not exceeding nine months, which may be discounted by such bank."

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Action on the committee amendments has been completed.

Mr. LENROOT. That leaves the bill open for amendment at any point.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment which I ask the Secretary to read, and then I ask that it may be pending for action on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 22, insert a new section, as follows:

Sec. 12. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act as amended be further amended by adding, after the words "being eligible for discount" and before the words "but such definition shall not include," the following words: "and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the Senator from Tennessee wishes to discuss the amendment. So I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being under the agreement until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it the intention that to-morrow we shall take an adjournment until 12 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] agreed the other day that on Sunday an adjournment should be taken until Monday, so that we would have a morning hour on Monday, and that agreement will be carried out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) adjourned, the adjournment being under the previous order until to-morrow, Sunday, January 28, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Monsignor Thomas, St. Patrick's Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Cease not, O Lord, to protect us. Every day brings new problems; every day begets new difficulties. Without Thy light and strength we are weak and we grope in darkness.

The results of our deliberations and the enactments we frame are laden with intense importance for the people we represent. And we beg Thee so earnestly to aid us powerfully in our labors and direct them into ways which are right and just.

We pray Thee especially for this day's needs and requirements that all proceed smoothly; that harmony reign and good will prevail.

Grant us counsel, fortitude, perseverance; in the end to rejoice in the accomplishment of good, the formulating of just measures, and fulfillment of Thy will and attainment of peace, progress, uprightness, and honesty of life, for Thy glory and the welfare of this Republic.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of judicial decisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of judicial decisions. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, in his extension of remarks of December 28 the able Member from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] briefly discussed the right to judicial reviews of legislative enactments. His suggestion that discussion of the subject is helpful reflects a general opinion of any important proposal, and the subject of a limitation to "judge-made laws" has also been urged by eminent authority.

A famous individual termed "John Doe" once figured conspicuously in legal lore and pleadings. The present case of Doe, as I understand it, is a protest against alleged reactionary men, parties, and policies and alleged reactionary judges, courts, or decisions. Any brief in support of Doe's contention might properly reach into volumes and should cover thoroughly different phases of the court's alleged usurpation and problems involved through judge-made laws. I leave that task to others who make such allegations and have the time and desire to prepare a case of that character.

The views I desire to express are without suggestion from anyone and I do not assume to speak for or represent others. Demands in past days for impeachment, or sensational or extreme statements are not quoted. The cause relates entirely to judicial regulation of the legislative branch of the Government and is impersonal.

In the brief time available I shall offer a few words for those who find fault more especially with a court decision that by five judges to four first set aside the income tax law passed by Congress. Thereafter when Congress and the country after long delay and arduous effort secured the sixteenth amendment wherewith to overrule the court's previous decision rendered by one overbalancing judge, the court again by another five to four decision set at naught the constitutional amendment by emasculating its purpose, so far as stock dividends were concerned. To use the language in that case of a dissenting opinion by Judge Holmes, one of the ablest judges in the country, in which Justice Day concurred:

The known purpose of this amendment was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes and I can not doubt that most people not lawyers would suppose when they voted for it that they put the question like the present at rest. I am of the opinion that the amendment justifies the tax.

Again I submit further judicial criticism of this decision thus in effect setting aside a constitutional amendment when, in the language of Justice Brandeis and Justice Clark, in the same case we have their judicial opinions as follows:

If stock dividends representing profits are held exempt from taxation under the sixteenth amendment, the owners of the most successful businesses in America will be able to escape taxation on a large part of what is actually their income. So far as their profits are represented by stock received as dividends they will pay these taxes not upon their income but only upon the income of their income. That such a result was intended by the people of the United States when adopting the sixteenth amendment is inconceivable. Our sole duty is to ascertain their intent as therein expressed.

A suggestion of some respect due Congress is voiced when the dissenting opinion further says:

It is but a decent respect due the wisdom, the integrity, and the patriotism of the legislative body by which any law is passed to presume in favor of its validity until the violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

From that dissenting decision of recent date—Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U. S.—it is proper to infer, based on high judicial authority, five members of the court refused to accept the will of the people as expressed in the sixteenth amendment and had no decent respect for the wisdom, the integrity, nor the patriotism of the American Congress. These are not my words, but four eminent members of the highest court in the land give voice to that effect, yet are outvoted by one judge.

OTHER JUDGES NOW DENY THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE COURT.

Courts and judges at the outset seek for authority, precedents, and other data before coming to any important decision. To that end I am submitting a few notes bearing on this question and on judge-made laws in general.

A very able and distinguished justice of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, Judge Eschweiler, without drawing any conclusions, contributed a thoughtful article in the December, 1922, number of the Marquette Law Review on the "veto power of the judiciary." Because of his eminently high standing and the careful analysis made, I quote the United States Supreme Court's position a century and a quarter ago when the Constitution was adopted. He says:

John Jay, who rendered distinguished services in securing the adoption of the Federal Constitution and as a diplomat in the perilous and delicate task of negotiating with England the treaty bearing his name, refused to accept a renewed appointment as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, because he felt that court could not obtain the essential energy, weight, and dignity nor acquire the public confidence and respect which it should possess. Alexander Hamilton, the master intellect of the formative period of this Government, in speaking of the judiciary as one of the branches of governmental power, said that it "is beyond comparison the weakest of the three departments of power; that it can never attack with success either of the other two; and that all possible care is requisite to enable it to defend itself against their attacks." Montesquieu, the French publicist, whose then recent work had a profound influence upon those who framed our Constitution, in dwelling on the English constitution of his day and the three sorts of power—legislative, executive, and judiciary—in such a democratic form of government, said that of such three "the judiciary is in some measure next to nothing."

HOW FAST THE SAME COURT HAS GROWN.

The growth of power of the same court in overturning acts of Congress is evidenced from conclusions and comparisons set forth by Judge Eschweiler in the same article briefly, as follows:

The (former) puny congressional football (the Supreme Court) now says to Congress that she (the court) may lawfully . . . set aside and hold for naught as unreasonable intrastate railroad rates duly declared reasonable by similar administrative bodies in the several States; yet says that the same body, Congress, in an attempted exercise of the identical constitutional provision may not regulate the subject matter of child labor by legislation as to the interstate shipments of the products of such labor. Again, it tells Congress that it can not constitutionally prescribe penalties for excessive expenditures in primary elections for United States Senators, although it had just held that a witness before a grand jury could not question the legality of this identical and void law. It speaks, and the statute of Arizona regulating judicial procedure in Arizona and denying to its own courts the right to issue preliminary injunctions, under certain conditions, in labor disputes involving a secondary boycott, is wiped off the statute book. It says in the State of Ohio, a sovereign in its own sphere and containing more inhabitants within its boundaries than were within the entire United States when the Supreme Court began to function, that it may not embody in its own constitution a provision permitting the submission by referendum to its own people for approval or disapproval the action of its own legislature in adopting the eighteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, but that under the identical Ohio constitutional referendum provision the people may vote and reject, if they so will, an act of the legislature redistricting the State for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress. The people of the State of Washington are told by the same court, after the exercise by them of the right granted by their own constitution to pass laws by the initiative, that their law so passed forbidding employment agencies charging workmen for obtaining positions was a violation of the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution and therefore void.

The growth of the court's jurisdiction and power, whether called usurpation or unexpressed rights under the Constitution, affords ample grounds for controversy, but my inquiry goes rather to present problems that are developing and to restrictions, if any, proper for Congress to urge through constitutional amendment to more clearly indicate limitations of the court's jurisdiction as originally intended by the framers over a century ago.

FROM ANOTHER JUDGE OF ANOTHER COURT.

From an address by Justice John Ford, of the New York Supreme Court, on January 18 of this year, I quote on this same point when he said:

Take the so-called legal-tender cases decided in 1870 and involving the constitutionality of the act of Congress making paper currency legal tender in payment of debts. First the law was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, five judges so voting against three favoring the constitutionality of the legal tender act. That decision would have been calamitous to the Nation, then struggling to keep its feet under the staggering financial burdens imposed by the Civil War. Consciousness of this probably influenced some of the justices, for shortly afterwards the same act was declared constitutional by a vote of five to four. (Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. 457; Repuburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 606.)

Other cases are cited by Judge Ford and Judge Eschweiler in their remarkable discussions occurring within the past 60 days, but these are quoted to indicate the scope of any study or decision on the subject of judge-made laws.

ANOTHER JUDGE ON JUDICIAL INFALLIBILITY.

Chief Justice Walter Clark, of North Carolina, in "Infallible government by the odd man"—American Law Review—is another high judicial authority that fearlessly discusses the abject helplessness of the American Congress when its carefully framed legislative act is arbitrarily set aside by one controlling justice. He says:

The power to set aside or nullify an act of Congress or a State legislature is a purely political power and is so recognized by the constitutions which give the veto to the Executive. It comes under no definition or conception of the judicial power which is to judge between the parties in controversy. Neither the Government nor the State is a party to these proceedings, in which its supremest power—that of enacting laws—is nullified. As claimed and exercised by the courts it is the absolute autocratic power, because it is irrevocable. Those whose interest it is to have such power over the legislature and Executive assert it for their own ends. The wonder is that it has ever been acquiesced in at all under a free form of government.

In addition to the estimates of these judges of high courts that the existing policy of enunciating judge-made law is unwarranted and indefensible under our free form of government, I offer additional authority and arguments that have the merit of high official sanction, whatever their influence on the case may be. Other writers and authorities may also be referred to by those who desire to study the right of the judiciary to set aside legislative enactment and also proposed methods of curtailing such power. Among these are Gilbert E. Roe, author of a strong and thorough analysis on "Our judicial oligarchy," Jackson H. Ralston in "Judicial control over legislatures as to constitutional questions"; William L. Ransom in "Majority rule and the judiciary"; J. Allen Smith in The Spirit of American Government—page 92; Brooks Adams in "Theory of social revolutions"; W. F. Dodd in Political Science Quarterly, volume 28, No. 1; Dean William Trickett in American Law Review, volume 41, page 650, and many others, including Judge Wannamaker, of Ohio—Illinois State Bar Year Book, 1912—whose crisp statement is quoted without comment wherein he says, referring to the court:

The exercise of this unwarranted and usurped governmental power against the public interest, against the public health, safety, and life, has done more than any other single thing to arouse the popular hostile feeling toward of courts of last resort.

My purpose is to describe briefly a situation unknown to any other government and that, in the words of Jefferson, eventually may threaten the existence of the present coordinate branches of our Government. To this end a few familiar arguments are offered with a tentative judicial limitation proposal for your consideration.

In a work on the Judicial Veto, a writer, after much research, says that among those who signed or took active part in making the Constitution, 16 members were against judicial control, while 11 were in favor.

With this comparison the same writer in analyzing reasons given by Gouverneur Morris, who it is stated wrote the Constitution at the direction of the makers, concludes:

Is it not the legitimate inference that the power of judicial control was neither overlooked nor attempted to be slipped in by indirect or ambiguous phrases but that it was intentionally omitted?

THE FIRST STEP AND ITS RECEPTION.

The Constitution drafted September 17, 1787, was not tested by the judiciary until Judge Marshall, in Marbury v. Madison, in 1803, threw down the gauntlet to President Jefferson by holding that the court was authorized under the Constitution to determine if a law passed by Congress was in conflict with that instrument.

It is said by some writers that Marshall "got the jump" on Jefferson by that first opinion rendered 16 years after the Constitution was signed. However that may be, Jefferson expressed his opinion of the court, over a century ago, in these unmistakable words:

The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundation of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone. Having found that impeachment is an impracticable thing, a mere scarecrow, they consider themselves secure for life; an opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority of one, delivered as unanimous and with the silent acquiescence of lazy and timid associates, by a crafty Chief Justice who sophisticates the law to his own mind by the turn of his own reasoning.

Again he said of the same court:

It has long been my opinion, and I have never shrunk from its expression, that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the judiciary—the irresponsible body working like gravity by day and by night, gaining a little to-day and gaining a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief over the field of jurisdiction until all shall be usurped.

THE WHITE HOUSE THEN; THE JAIL NOW.

That fearless estimate, written by Jefferson, the lawyer and writer of the immortal Declaration of Independence and an honored President, would have landed him in jail instead of the White House if penned in the year 1923.

Even John Randolph, one of the ablest of the old Romans, drew an amendment to the Constitution in those early days which read:

The judges of the Supreme Court and all other courts of the United States shall be removed by the President on the joint address of both Houses of Congress.

Under existing nomenclature, Jefferson would be styled a radical and a red, while Randolph would be a type of soviet and bolshevist that needed close watching by the Department of Justice.

Old Hickory Jackson was a soldier President.

In his message of July 10, 1832, returning to the Senate without his approval the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, he says:

The Congress, the Executive, and the court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval as it is of the supreme judges when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative capacities, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve.

WARNING ADVICE FROM HIGH JUDICIAL AUTHORITY.

Mr. Justice Chase announced the early doctrine of the court when he said in Hylton against United States:

If the court have such power, I am free to declare I will never exercise it but in a very clear case.

Mr. Justice Miller, before the "seeming law" estimate was announced, said of the court's duty in One hundredth United States Legal Tender cases:

When this court is called on in the course of the administration of the law to consider whether an act of Congress or any other department of the Government is within the constitutional authority of that department a due respect for the coordinate branch of the Government requires that we shall decide it has transcended its powers only when it is so plain we can not avoid the duty.

I have italicized words that indicate when due respect or disrespect may be determined according to opinions found in Supreme Court decisions.

Justice Waite, afterwards Chief Justice, said in Ninety-ninth United States, page 718:

Every possible presumption is in favor of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the Government can not encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule.

Justice Harlan, in the New York Bakeries case (198 U. S. 68), announced a safe doctrine, and said:

If there be doubt as to the validity of the statute that doubt must therefore be resolved in favor of its validity and the courts must keep their hands off, leaving the legislature to meet the responsibilities of unwise legislation.

A comparison of two expressions from two Chief Justices a century apart will disclose the progress of the court in its alleged usurpation of constitutional rights of Congress.

THE MODERATION OF MARSHALL—THE THUNDERING TONES OF TAFT.

We have our conception of Marshall, the militant, defiant so-called "judicial usurper," shattered by his own voice. Those who listen for hurled defiance in response to fierce thrusts of Jefferson will find nothing in words or inference to warrant by the following from Chief Justice Marshall in Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 87-128):

The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom if ever to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. It is not in slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered void.

The italicized words are mine. "Seldom if ever," said Marshall.

A century thereafter, in 1922; we find the once all-powerful legislative branch of this Government now dwarfed to the position of a suppliant for legislative license constantly waiting, hat in hand, in the anteroom of the court for its seal of approval. The loss of prestige and power of the American Congress and growth of imperial authority by the once mild-mannered court is best expressed by a lusty challenge of Justice Taft, chief for life. In the late case of Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. (May 15, 1922), he declares:

It is the high duty and function of this court in cases regularly brought to its bar to decline to recognize or enforce seeming laws of Congress dealing with subjects not intrusted to Congress, but left or committed by the supreme law of the land to the control of the States. We can not avoid the duty, even though it requires us to refuse to give effect to legislation designed to promote the highest good.

Again the italicized words are mine.

THE COURT "DECLINES TO RECOGNIZE SEEMING LAWS OF CONGRESS."

Chief Justice Taft delivering the above opinion that "seeming laws" of Congress are "not to be recognized" by the court, in the same opinion sought to distinguish the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wallace, 533) relating to increased taxation of circulatory notes of persons and State banks reaching 900 per cent increase, affirming the law, in which that court says:

The first answer to this is that the judicial can not prescribe to the legislative departments of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts but to the people by whom its Members are elected.

This decision Chief Justice Taft distinguishes because the child labor law enacted by Congress taxing the same rate on interstate traffic of child-labor goods he says is only a "seeming law of Congress." From that decision Justice Clark dissented. Without a child-labor amendment like the fifteenth amendment, which affects the color of skin, or a sixteenth amendment relating to the income tax, Congress can not pass any legislation relating to child labor by taxation or otherwise, because that would be "seeming law" which the Supreme Court in the words of Judge Taft will "not recognize."

From 1803, when the Marbury case was decided, down to 1851, or for 48 years, or 64 years after the signing of the Constitution, the court did not declare any act of Congress unconstitutional, and on that second occasion only to determine a matter of jurisdiction of district courts (13 How. 40).

THE THIRD COURT REVERSAL WAS ITSELF REVERSED BY WAR.

The third and "undermining" case occurred in 1857, or 70 years thereafter, when the court rendered a decision (Dred Scott, 19 How. 393) that was reversed by the people of the United States through a war lasting three and one-half years and the loss of many hundreds of thousands of lives.

A concise estimate of the Dred Scott decision is found in these words:

The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

The words above quoted are found in the inaugural address delivered by President Abraham Lincoln, whose independence first placed him in Congress and later in the White House instead of jail, although he fought the Mexican War openly on this floor and afterwards led the hosts that reversed the Dred Scott decision in the field of final decision.

The modern twentieth century standards of muffled criticism in both peace and war had not yet grown popular. Men then frankly spoke their minds without thought of the press or patronage, grown powerful to-day.

WHEN THE COURT ASSUMES ABSOLUTISM, WHAT FOLLOWS?

I call attention to the recent Macomber stock-dividend decision (252 U. S.) under the income tax constitutional amendment. The court did not venture again to declare the law unconstitutional, but another 5-to-4 decision emasculated the income tax law by exempting stock dividends, so that, in a vigorous dissenting opinion by four justices, Brandeis, Clark, Day, and Holmes, the latter said, as heretofore quoted:

The known purpose of this amendment (income tax) was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes, and I can not doubt that most people not lawyers would suppose when they voted for it that they put the question like the present (stock dividend) at rest. I am of the opinion that the amendment justifies the (stock dividend) tax.

The stock dividend emasculating decision furnishes a good text for further discussion.

What a spectacle is presented to the country when the Supreme Court practically twice decided the income tax law by Congress unconstitutional, first by a vote of 5 to 4, and when after infinite labor the country had reversed the court by the income tax amendment, the same Supreme Court, again by a vote of 5 to 4, emasculated the law, according to the above judicial opinion held by four able members of the court.

Pursuant to the income tax amendment, the American Congress had accepted the people's mandate and passed an income tax law fixing the rate of taxes on incomes. Passed by the House and Senate and signed by the President, this law was fought tenaciously by big business interests and then finally emasculated by the Supreme Court, as stated in one of its teeter-totter 5-to-4 decisions.

The decision of less than three years ago was a cause for jubilation to owners of great wealth generally, and because of that decision upward of $2,000,000,000 in stock dividends, recently declared, have escaped individual taxation. Under existing law on that amount there would have been paid in surtaxes, possibly, a half billion dollars into the National Treasury, unless the tax was otherwise evaded. How did the Supreme Court come to subvert the purpose of a constitutional amendment? How could one man, who cast the deciding vote, thus without constitutional authority set aside the people's will?

FAMILIAR CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS WITH A NEW READING.

The powers of the Supreme Court are defined in three short sections of Article III, and I submit in passing that in no place in the Constitution is it suggested that any court is empowered to set aside any act of Congress.

Article I of the Constitution contains nine sections describing the powers and functions of the House and Senate. The legislative branch of Government in 1787 was considered to be of primary importance, judging from its first place and powers granted by that document.

Article II, relating to the Executive, consists of four sections and precedes the judiciary provision. Nowhere in either Articles I, II, or III does it appear that the Supreme Court is empowered, directly or indirectly, to set aside or even interfere with the authority conferred in Articles I and II when these governmental agencies combine to enact law, nor, in fact, is power anywhere given to trespass upon that authority.

Article VI expressly declares—

The Constitution and the laws of the United States * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby. * * *

Modern interpretation seeks to read into our Constitution that the Supreme Court at Washington is granted jurisdiction whenever the instrument is silent or fails to anticipate the new order.

Article III, providing for the Supreme Court, does not give any license for the appointment of judges, but does provide they shall hold office "during good behavior." Their nomination is conferred on the President under section 2 of Article II, and significantly these old forefathers of ours provided further that the power to "nominate" such judges could only be exercised by and with the "consent of the Senate."

If any restriction is to be found it occurs in Article III, section 2, as follows:

The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Congress was given express power to regulate the court's jurisdiction which the court with fine irony has transposed to read:

Congress may make seeming laws under regulations and limitations to be determined by any five members of the Supreme Court.

A FAMILIAR RULE OF BOTH FACT AND LAW.

To any questioning of its jurisdiction the court points to a familiar rule of law voiced by the culprit improperly lodged in jail, "Well, I'm here, ain't I." This well-surrounded precedent under existing practice is the only jurisdictional plea Congress is privileged to make according to such high and exalted authority as the court itself.

The story of claimed usurpation of power, heretofore briefly referred to, is familiar, and when we read a pronouncement by the Supreme Court setting aside some law passed by Congress after months of study and debate by the two Houses or when amendments to the Constitution after ratification by three-fourths of the States are emasculated we are prone to ask by what power is a man taken from the Halls of Congress or from private life, given superhuman intelligence or infallible judgment when placed in the courtroom? Possibly a hundred fairly able lawyers in Congress may differ in their judgment, but the novitiate justice becomes ipso facto omniscient when he takes his seat. Thereafter he assumes to pass upon and hold nugatory the "seeming laws" enacted by Congress, and the country must wait in suspense to learn when a law is not a law, to be determined by this novitiate.

JUDGES ARE CHOSEN, HOW?

Who now are chosen to be members of the court and how and why? The Constitution subordinates such nominations and confirmations to action by the Executive and the Senate. At what stage of the proceedings thereafter does transformation of the individual and his right to unwritten constitutional usurpation begin, and in this inquiry I yield to no man in my high respect for the court or its judges.

The Executive nominates a lawyer from the House or Senate, for illustration, to sit in the court for his natural life. He may be what is popularly known as a State or Federal "lame duck," repudiated by his constituents, or a live, active duck; but by one sweep of the pen the Executive nominates a man for the bench, whatever his qualification or fitness, whose voice in a five to four court decision may exceed the collective power of 435 Representatives of the people added to 96 Senators, of which body he may have been a single Member. Again, this one new justice without constitutional authority, therefore, becomes by the pen's sweep greater than the Executive who created him or, by way of familiar illustration, greater than the 100,000,000 people who by constitutional amendment sought to tax incomes irrespective of tax-free securities or of nontaxable stock dividends. One justice thus turned the decision in the Macomber case that exempted $2,000,000,000 in stock dividends during the last six months from taxation against the expressed will of the people, according to four judges. By what right did he do so?

Do we need to carry the illustration further, reaching men appointed to the court whose whole career ordinarily has been in an atmosphere of corporate power unknown and impossible to have been anticipated by framers of the Constitution?

No one questions the untrammelled right to make such appointments, but it serves to illustrate how one Executive may in four years name a majority of the court whose training, environment, and decisions for a generation to come will affect and control changing conditions of government.

Press announcements and magazines say we are about to adopt the English system of high court appointments. That the Chief Justice, through the Executive, will recommend such appointments. No English court can set aside a law of Parliament. Here the court assumes that right and 300 State and Federal labor laws have been so set aside by the various courts. In an English monarchy from which we declared our independence the people rule through a parliament that may be summarily recalled. Here the court justices selected for life finally determine the law and the Chief Justice is now to select his associates and thus rule supreme.

A SEEMING CANDIDACY.

Let us suppose, for illustration and in an impersonal way, that the people, from whom all power comes, in their supreme judgment decide that an Executive is not fitted to direct the affairs of the country. Without offense, then assume he is overwhelmingly defeated, repudiated for reelection at the polls, receiving only 8 electoral votes out of 531 for its highest office. Whether the rejection occurred through lack of confidence in his past record, his policies, temperament, surrounding influences, or for other reasons unnecessary to discuss, the repudiation by the country stands. The verdict is overwhelming.

Thereafter assume that this same ex-official is placed by a successor in the position of Chief Justice for life.

What answer can be offered to the proposition that, after the highest officer in the land, the maker of justices and chief justices, has been overwhelmingly recalled by the people, a succeeding President may appoint this same recalled Executive to the highest court for life, without recall or any review of decisions? I speak of this possibility impersonally. If protests against such an anomaly are heard, then what may be offered against corporation, railway, or other attorneys, however able, who receive similar life appointments and are thus empowered to set aside State and Federal laws without any recall or review?

THE ONLY GOVERNMENT WITH JUDICIAL GUARDIANS.

It is unnecessary to add this is the only great Government in the world where such unlimited power is reposed in any man or group of men not subject to recall or review. The transcendent importance to powerful interests of such appointments to the highest court may well be understood when matters of taxation, trusts, or other litigation are subject to final decision without review. Where recommendations for appointment or protests are secretly made, no public knowledge exists of methods employed in making nominations, but such interests would naturally strenuously urge or oppose particular candidates for judge before the nomination, and the Executive may easily be misled in such nominations under present practices. Once named, confirmation ordinarily results, and a life tenure follows without possibility of recall or review.

It is not clear to the average layman who makes up over 95 per cent of our people just why a railway lawyer or specializing attorney should be preferred for the highest judicial post in the land when 48 chief justices of the 48 States and hundreds of other able judges are available material from which to choose. In fact, thousands of judges of inferior courts throughout the land may furnish available material over a man of close corporate affiliations who has never sat on any bench. Nor does this question the ability of any Executive's choice, but no greater surprise would follow the appointment to the court of a governor recently defeated for reelection by several hundred thousand votes, although such nomination was rumored in the press for a recent Supreme Court vacancy.

CANDIDATES CONSIDERED FOR COURT APPOINTMENTS.

In this connection, the possible present and past of court membership is not without interest. On January 2, 1923, the press announced that next March a conspicuous Cabinet officer will resign. The Tea Pot Dome lease to a Standard Oil subsidiary and extreme readiness to part with other Government resources have brought forth utterances in legislative halls for many months urging such resignation, so it was a distinct surprise to learn from the same authority that the resigning official had been offered a judgeship on the United States Supreme Court bench, and also that the overwhelmingly defeated governor of New York had declined that same honor. Even the past is not devoid of interest. Standard Oil's 5-to-4 stock-dividends decision heretofore referred to was won by a present Cabinet officer during an interim, whose previous position as a justice on that same bench gave him unsurpassed prestige when later addressing the same court of which he had once been a part. Hair-splitting distinctions were rejected by Marshall, who said, "Seldom if ever" should the court so act.

The "seeming laws" on income taxes passed by Congress and approved by the people were set aside or emasculated by two different 5-to-4 "seeming opinions" of the court.

Is it such knowledge on the part of big business interests that brings constant threats from them of repeal or emasculation by the court of regularly enacted laws affecting such interests? Some testimony of such belief is available. No one need question the integrity of the court individually or collectively or that its decisions are based on the untrammelled judgment of its members. In like manner it may fairly be assumed that however high minded its members are human, and due to a lifelong training may be subject to conscious or unconscious influences not conducive to the development of a judicial temperament. If they are not human with strong political opinions and prejudices then why should the court be kept politically balanced?

OTHER JUDGES WHO ARE RESPONSIBLE TO THE PEOPLE.

The American people are not governed by any fetish in their appraisal of the fallibility of judges of the State courts of last resort. Many of these judges would grace any court in the land, yet the States did not follow the Federal Constitution of life tenure, but provided that all judges from the lowest to the highest courts should submit their candidacies to the people. Instead of adopting the same fundamentally democratic practice by having Federal judges stand for elections on their records or making such judges subject to recall or their decisions subject to a referendum, I submit we have gone far afield from the original purpose of government when we abandon our legislative duties and prerogatives to a court that declares State and Federal laws unconstitutional and neither originally nor thereafter submits itself or its record to the people as all State courts are compelled to do at stated times at the polls.

I have no criticism to bring against any judge or Executive, past, present, or prospective, and speak impersonally of practices rather than of men. We are confronted with the proposition that the Supreme Court judge who is to decide questions involving hundreds of millions of dollars or of human rights of untold value and who assumes to override constitutionally provided methods of enacting law, by his decisions receives his certificate of life tenure from the Executive. It may be based on friendship or other influences. One man now makes a grant to the other of unlimited power which he does not possess for himself. What of the source of power that appoints?

AN ESTIMATE OF THE SOURCE OF ALL POWER TO-DAY.

A few days ago—December 9—a press report of a public address contained an estimate of the source of executive power expressed by the mayor of New York. Mayor Hylan was elected and reelected overwhelmingly by the metropolis and is supposed to speak with some authority and some knowledge of the financial interests of New York with which he has been brought into contact, presumably through his position. In his public address of about a month ago Mr. Hylan said:

A small group of excessively wealthy individuals control both the major political parties and through the exercise of powerful, sinister, and too often unlawful influence have become dictators of the destinies of more than 110,000,000 people. They have dictated nominations for the Presidency, written the platforms and party pledges, and because of their campaign fund contributions have arrogated the right to dictate governmental policies.

No stronger indictment has ever been offered of both parties and of their policies, nor do I unreservedly subscribe to that belief. But from the days of Bryce's disclosures of American hidden political agencies over 20 years ago down to the present time evidence of the growth and activities of invisible government centered in New York City has been cumulative.

Major La Guardia, Congressman-elect, Republican, New York, who resigned from the House five years ago to assume command of aviation during the war in the Italian sector, was afterwards elected president of the board of aldermen of New York City—a position of importance far beyond the lieutenant governorship of many States. La Guardia says:

Judge Ford's strictures on the judiciary express the sentiment of people generally in every walk of life. The invisible government controls public affairs more effectively now than ever before because it works secretly and owns a great many avenues of publicity. The lesson of last election gave notice that government must be returned to the people, but this lesson has made the same invisible government more determined to keep control of the courts. What good is progressive legislation if such legislation may be destroyed by the courts?

Bearing on this proposition, is it proper to say regarding political parties and candidates for the Presidency that both of the old corrupt party machines are under the dominion of the plunder league of the professed politicians who are controlled and sustained by the beneficiaries of privilege and reaction, or is it proper to say the papers conveniently grouped as representing Wall Street interests supported Judge Parker for the Presidency in 1904 and almost unanimously supported Mr. Taft for the Republican nomination on his candidacy for renomination? I quote this exact language from pages 116 to 120 of Progressive Principles, by Roosevelt, contained in his speech before the national committee of the Progressive Party August 6, 1912.

Honorary punishment for Roosevelt's temerity was promised in his certain renomination and election for the Presidency in 1920 but for his untimely death. Quotation marks are omitted because these, to many minds, determine the difference in estimate between the rational and the radical. Even that fine orator, and now conservative radical, ex-Senator Beveridge, who was temporary chairman, on the same occasion said:

These special interests which suck the people's substance are bipartisan. They are the invisible government behind our visible government. ROOSEVELT AND BEVERIDGE WERE ONCE TERMED RADICALS.

Presidents, judges, lawyers, and laymen have voiced their protest against the tendency of the courts to arrogate to themselves the right both to legislate by judge-made laws and to adjudicate. Those who urge blind unquestioning faith in this tendency of the courts as a test of "Americanism versus Radcalism" are confronted with the record and prophesies of the fearless American among Americans, Roosevelt, who in unmeasured terms denounced the trend of court decisions, and with his disciple and able chairman of the progressive convention—Beveridge—proposed and indorsed a vigorous platform demanding so-called radical legislation to prevent an alleged threatened control of the judiciary and of judicial decisions by the invisible government, so strongly denounced by Beveridge at the convention.

The bitter condemnation of those who knew him best brought about the unparalleled defeat for reelection of President Taft while the turn of the wheel had made certain the reelection of Roosevelt.

The people are discovering that Roosevelt and Beveridge were not radicals but were prophets crying in the wilderness whose prophesies, then doubted, now command wide attention.

Nor is it necessary to follow the extreme leadership that once declared present high judicial officers were then supported by the Wall Street press. Men generally will believe that tendencies and training instead of any invisible government have occasioned questionable decisions from the different courts.

Apart from the opinions of Jefferson, Jackson, Randolph, Lincoln, and others of early days, when within a brief time Mayor Hylan, ex-President Roosevelt, ex-Senator Beveridge, and countless other men enjoying public confidence have concluded that money influences the selection of executives in both major parties; that the invisible government is bipartisan; that big men pervert the courts to their own uses, followed by repeated appointments of justices from great corporate environments to the highest judicial posts, where one man may reverse Congress and emasculate a constitutional amendment ratified by 36 States, what answer can be made to the proposition that one Executive may and does by such appointment, though unintentional, nullify the will of the people for a generation to come? Again I repeat the average man may not subscribe to all these conclusions, however high the authority, but opinions are submitted in support of a tentative proposal that will be offered to meet the situation, whatever the facts may be.

THE QUALITY OF MERCY AND TREND OF JUSTICE.

A direct and serious charge affecting every phase of government has come from the mayor of a city second to none in the world in influence and wealth, from a man who rules over more people in New York City than are found in any one of 44 States of the Union. That he is not alone in his estimate of wealth's influence in public affairs appears from a press statement of January 19, 1923, wherein Supreme Court Justice John Ford, of New York, a Republican in politics, is quoted as saying of "judicial usurpation":

That courts are partial to accumulated wealth no impartial student of the subject can doubt. * * * They are on the side of the powerful employer and against his employees, and they are daily, through judge-made laws, oppressing the poor and lowly in the interests of amassed capital.

Again he said:

Federal judges are the worst, because they are appointed for life and not responsible to the voters. Their selection is left to lawyers, and lawyers are the employees of wealthy men and large corporations.

President Taft in a Chicago speech long ago is quoted as saying:

Of all the questions that are before the American people, I regard no one as more important than this, to wit: The improvement of the administration of justice. We must make it so that the poor man will have as nearly as possible an equal opportunity in litigating as the rich man; and under present conditions, ashamed as we may be of it, this is not a fact.

That the poor man does not have an equal opportunity in litigating as the rich man is a fact of which we are ashamed, according to an eminent man, once President, now Chief Justice of the United States.

"CORPORATIONS HAVE TAKEN POSSESSION OF THE COURTS."

Again I quote—

At the present time the supreme power is not in the hands of the people but in the power of the judges, who can set aside at will any expression of the peoples will made through an act of Congress or a State legislature. These judges are not chosen by the people nor subject to review by them. This is arbitrary power and the corporations have taken possession of it simply by naming a majority of the judges.

No; this is not an extract from the writings of any alien or destroyer of the Republic. It is the opinion of Chief Justice Walter Clark, of the North Carolina Supreme Court, expressed deliberately in The Arena and is in harmony with the opinion of Jefferson, expressed over a century ago.

Possibly no woman has the confidence of the people of this country above Jane Addams, whose ability, conservatism of expression and interest in humanity is known to all. She is quoted as saying:

From my experience I would say, perhaps, that the one symptom among workmen which most distinctly indicates a class feeling is a growing distrust of the integrity of the courts, the belief that the present judge has been a corporation attorney, that his sympathies and experience and his whole view of life is on the corporation side.

Commenting on an article by President Hadley, of Yale, wherein he discussed the position of property rights in America to the exclusion of human rights, a writer, Delos F. Wilcox, Ph.D. in the Independent said:

As a matter of fact, it is not Bryan or Roosevelt or Lincoln Steffens or Charles Edward Russell that is the revolutionist; these men talk; the Supreme Court of the United States acts. * * * The truth is that all kinds of men occupy the bench, among them men who secured their positions through all the different degrees of political chicanery practiced in American politics. Judges appointed for life, having no fear of the power of the people or of the Executive to rebuke them, are likely to interpret the law according to their own interests and sympathies.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN NAME ONLY.

Governor Aldrich, of Nebraska, criticizing a Federal judge's decision in the Minnesota Rate case, is quoted as saying:

When any court, whether it be the United States Supreme Court or a court of inferior jurisdiction, continually makes effort by a judicial decision to do that which the people and the people alone have a right to do, then I say that such a court is seeking to establish judicial tyranny, and if allowed to proceed unchallenged along the line of this unwarranted assumption of power representative government will simply be that in name only.

Governor Aldrich was discussing the powers of the State before a conference of governors in 1911. This was long before the Supreme Court of the United States had held, in effect, that Federal powers of rate control would be held to supersede any State control over rates entirely within the State.

I have been quoting latterly from the remarkably able presentation of "Our judicial oligarchy," by Gilbert E. Roe, a strong lawyer formerly from my own State. Chosen to assume the responsible position of counsel and examiner for a Senate committee on the present oil investigation, Mr. Roe is now demonstrating his fitness and fearlessness for the duties of that position.

One of the ablest articles I have read on the general subject is "Back to the Constitution," by Chief Justice Clark, of North Carolina. Quoting briefly, he says:

Let us go "back to the Constitution" as it is written. Let Congress and the legislatures legislate, subject to the only restriction conferred by the Constitution, the suspensive veto of the Executive, and with further supervision in the people alone, who can be trusted with their own government, else republican form of government is a failure.

It must be remembered that there is no line in the Constitution which gives the courts, instead of the people, supervision over Congress or the legislature. There is no constitutional presumption that five judges will be infallible and that four will be fallible. If the legislative and executive departments of the Government err, the people can correct it. But when the courts err, as they frequently do, for instance, as in Chisholm v. Georgia, in the Dartmouth College case, or in the income-tax case, not to mention others, there is no remedy except by the long, slow process of a constitutional amendment or by a change in the personnel of the court, which is necessarily very slow when the judges hold for life, as they do in the Federal courts.

There is no room in a republican form of government for "judicial hegemony."

When men of high political positions and high on the bench, sworn to uphold and administer the laws, frankly confess a fundamental weakness is found in their broad experience and express judgments quoted, what must be the belief of the man on the street whose voice and whose part in our scheme of government weighs even with that of the highest official? Such indictments can not be lightly thrust aside by those who believe differently, for reminders occur of the weakness and warping of poor human nature from he who wears judicial ermine to the humblest clad.

From Roosevelt's 1913 Lincoln Day speech I quote:

In this State of New York there have been many well-meaning judges who in certain cases, usually affecting labor, have rendered decisions which were wholly improper, wholly reactionary, and fraught with the gravest injustice to those classes of the community standing most in need of justice.

Of Roosevelt's statement quoted, Judge Ford says:

This arrogation of sovereign power by the courts—the power to make laws which fit their individual political and economic views and predilections, without responsibility to the people bound by those laws—is a growing danger to our democracy. * * * Little by little this process of usurpation has gone, until now we find the courts boldly proclaiming the right to say what shall and shall not be law, regardless of the legislature or the will of the people. * * * As the king and his judges were immune from popular criticism in the old days, so we have clothed our judges with like prerogatives of royalty.

"SAFE" FEDERAL JUDGES FROM A JUDICIAL VIEWPOINT.

Possibly one of the most significant statements in a long, thoughtful address by this judge comes in his analysis of reasons for appointment of judges, which he handles as fearlessly as others have done when discussing the matter of selecting Presidents who make judges. He says:

But there is a more ominous feature in the tendency of the judiciary to legislate for the people. The simple fact is that of all departments of government the judiciary has been looked after by the interests. Their influential lawyers have faithfully sought to get "safe" judges on the bench. That is, "safe" as Wall Street understands the term. Particularly have they been successful in procuring the appointment of "safe" Federal judges. Consider the line of Presidents we have had during the past century. Think of the baleful forces through which some of them were nominated and elected. Ponder on the malign influences which surrounded them in office and operated upon their minds in respect of all judicial appointments. Is it any wonder that we have a "safe" Federal judiciary? And the judges they appointed are in office for life and wholly irresponsible to the people over whom they presume to exercise sovereign power. And this in a government of, by, and for the people. Verily, is eternal vigilance the price of liberty.

The fifty-fourth volume of American Law Review contains a thoughtful review of five judges to four decisions of the Supreme Court by Fred A. Maynard, who quotes from the executive council of the American Federation of Labor a proposal somewhat similar to that of Roosevelt regarding a referendum of decisions. Without expressing approval, he quotes:

We mean that the power of government shall be taken out of the hands of our judiciary, which now exercises a power exercised by no other judiciary in the world. We mean that when the people of the United States have educated themselves up to certain reforms in government, when these reforms have been run into legislation and passed by Congress and approved by the President, they shall not be nullified by the edict of the judiciary, which sometimes, owing to a decision of the court, is the edict of a single man.

Analyzing the growing protest against this anomalous growth of judicial power, Maynard says:

They can not understand how such a law can be so doubtful, in a constitutional sense, when they know that before it was enacted it was critically examined by the Judiciary Committee of both House and Senate, composed of the ablest lawyers of the Congress; when they know that it was also examined by the Attorney General of the United States, then when four justices of the court, after full consideration, are also of the opinion that the law is constitutional, they think, and I submit they have reason to think, that no such doubt exists as to warrant the annulment of the law by a 5 to 4 vote. No man can be convicted without a unanimous vote of 12 men. In all cases of impeachment a two-thirds vote is required. I submit that this rule should obtain when a law of Congress is impeached. I have known the power of one vote. I have shown that mighty events have resulted from the casting of one vote. Knowing full well its power, I would, if I could, prevent its exercise when thereby a law of Congress would be declared void.

CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM OCCURS THROUGH DISCUSSION.

Any questioning of a court decision, whether united or divided, or any suggestion of court review or recall of judges invites a charge that it is an attack upon the court. It is unnecessary to refute such time-worn methods and when coming from those who deem themselves beneficiaries of the average decision which may be influenced by habitual attacks on Congress, the inquiry comes: What better evidence of some needed change may be afforded than criticisms from such quarters?

I have avoided quoting what seemed to be extravagant or sensational criticisms of the court or its decisions. It is a question relating entirely to the system and is as proper to discuss rationally and moderately as differing methods of nominating or electing Presidents and United States Senators.

Speaking specifically of the courts and those who pervert the courts, I quote from another:

Certain big men who also have sometimes perverted the courts to their own uses now tell us it is impious to speak of the people's insisting upon justice being done by the courts. We say, in the words of Lincoln, that we must prevent wrong "being done by Congress or courts." The people of the United States are rightful masters of both Congress and courts, not to overthrow the Constitution but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution.

Again, no "radical" here expresses his opinion of the court unless Roosevelt was radical; but by the same measure Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln were radical in their criticisms of the courts. Against four eminent ex-Presidents, four of the greatest, what voice do we hear? "His master's voice" may frequently be heard through those who criticize these fearless critics. Yet the ex-Presidents were all popular idols because they remained true to ideals of government.

WHEN DOES THE MAN BECOME SUPERMAN?

Let me quote in this connection the comprehensive expression of an eminent lawyer, Senator, and able statesman, who said, on December 29, according to the Record:

A man who is elected President from this Senate floor does not know a bit more the moment after he is elected than he did before he was elected. He is the same man in a different job. His wisdom has not increased a particle. A man who is taken from the bar or bench of the country and put in the office of Secretary of State does not know a bit more the moment after than he did the moment before he was confirmed by the Senate. . . . There is not one of them whose opinion upon a great matter would have been accepted as a finality the day before he got into office. Why should he be regarded as infallible the moment he is elected or appointed?

Continuing the unanswerable conclusions drawn by Senator REED, we may well ask, "Why should a man be transformed into a King Solomon the moment he is appointed on the bench, or why should a railway lawyer, however able, be placed where his one vote may overturn the will of the House, the Senate, and the Executive in a 5-to-4 teeter-totter decision? Again, why was he appointed, when hundreds of able State supreme court judges were equally available?"

Several years ago, July 31, 1911, a Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] presented a bill for the recall of Federal judges. One strong argument advanced was that the chief value of the recall will be found in making its use unnecessary. Knowledge of the power would hold in check the natural tendency of unrestrained judicial decisions.

The Senator advanced a further argument that if judges should be appointed for life, why not have Senators and Congressmen appointed by the President for life. He says what we all know to be true:

A judge on the bench is only a human being after all, and he might become intemperate, not sufficiently to justify impeachment perhaps, but to justify recall. He might become mentally incapable or physically incapable, not sufficiently perhaps to justify impeachment. Such a judge might become corrupt and be so skillful in his corrupt judgments that it would be impossible to impeach and yet the wisdom of his removal might be beyond doubt.

Illustrating his point, Senator OWEN called attention to the electoral commission that seated President Hayes, when in four cases the commission divided regularly 8 to 7, according to previous political affiliation, including Justices Bradley, Clifford, Miller, Field, and Strong, of the Supreme Court.

I do not offer any opinion when recalling that in the last presidential campaign some one had to be chosen as Executive who would select judges for life. A fund of more than a million dollars was disclosed to have been contributed and expended for one particular candidate in the nomination campaign. It was not the judiciary but the Senate that revealed a brazen attempt to purchase the Presidency. Kenyon did the job, but the fearless man who sought to purge our body politic of a supreme offense has now been translated from the Senate, not to the Supreme Court, where his abilities and fearlessness would have helped to humanize decisions, but Kenyon is now placed where large national questions will rarely disturb him or those who fear him. Again, a decision by the Supreme Court was recently handed down that unlimited expenditures may be made in primaries, notwithstanding State or Federal corrupt practices acts are to the contrary. More recently the people reviewed that decision with a list of many political casualties found among those who had registered the same views as the court on the political expenditures of a former Michigan Senator.

INFLUENCES THAT MAKE THE COURT INFALLIBLE(?).

The leading Cabinet officer to-day and close presidential advisor, whose ability and personal high standing is beyond criticism, according to a complimentary intimation in the opinion, turned the Supreme Court decision in favor of his client—Standard Oil—in the stock dividend 5 to 4 decision (252 U. S.) by 1 majority of the court. The Newberry $200,000 campaign fund decision in like manner was a teeter-totter 5 to 4 court decision, with Mr. Hughes again chief counsel for the victor. (256 U. S. 233.) He there contended in legal phraseology that "regulations affecting times, places, and manner of holding elections" did not relate to nominations, because the only way to determine the egg was by the chicken—if it hatched—at least that was the substance of the majority opinion, although the case had other angles.

Chief Justice White, Justices Pitney, Brandeis, and Clark rejected ex-Justice Hughes's reasoning, but again he had the fifth gun, and that always turns the judicial tide of battle. However, both decisions were rejected by the country when an expression at the polls could be had from the people who do not appreciate the "niceties of law" that weighed most with the fifth judge in both hairsplitting decisions.

Rejected in the tax case I submit as evidenced from the vote on the income-tax amendment ratified by 36 States and interpreted by four able justices and rejected in the primary expenditure case by the long list of political fatalities recorded at the last election. Finely drawn distinctions were offered to justify both decisions, but the people, who have the last voice, are not and were not in sympathy with either judgment of the court if sentiment can be gathered from the ballot-box returns of the several States.

THE CHILD'S HAT OF 1787 FOR 100,000,000 PEOPLE.

Sincere and insincere questioners who object to any "monkey-ing" with the Constitution seem to forget that if the framers of that instrument had intended that the court or any other body was to be a sort of governess for Congress, they would have so provided in the bond between the States. Many of our modern woes, real or imaginary, have arisen from trying to satisfy a majority of the court's views, that are subject to modification or radical change with a changing court—a problem found nowhere else in the world.

Unless we say, with unctuous sophistry, we can not trust the people who are the government to decide how their Government shall be run, then State and Federal Constitutions will never be proper subjects of change. In upholding the workmen's compensation laws of Wisconsin, Chief Justice Winslow, a dearly loved official, announced a doctrine that might well be followed more regularly when he said:

When an eighteenth-century constitution forms the charter of liberty of a twentieth-century government, must its general provisions be construed and interpreted by an eighteenth-century mind in the light of eighteenth-century conditions and ideals? Certainly not. * * *

ROOSEVELT ON THE RECALL OF JUDGES.

After paying full tribute to the able judiciary of the country, in which every fair-minded man agrees, Roosevelt, in his address to the Ohio constitutional convention, expressed himself so clearly and unmistakably that I quote:

Either the recall of judges will have to be adopted or else it will have to be made much easier than it is now to get rid, not merely of a bad judge but of a judge, however virtuous, who has grown so out of touch with social needs and facts that he is unfit longer to render good service on the bench.

It is nonsense to say that impeachment meets the difficulty. (That was Jefferson's same criticism.) In actual practice we have found that impeachment does not work, that unfit judges stay on the bench in spite of it, and, indeed, because of the fact that impeachment is the only remedy that can be used against them. Impeachment as a remedy for the ills of which the people justly complain is a complete failure. A quicker, a more summary remedy is needed.

Roosevelt was speaking of State courts, but the same argument affects United States Supreme Court decisions that invalidate both State and Federal laws. A resemblance and a distinction between the highest State and highest Federal court is noted, for State laws permit the people of the State in time to remove at the polls the offending judge, whereas a Supreme Justice whose vote may set aside both Federal or State laws concerning the most vital public questions, is responsible to no one during his natural life.

No court veto of legislative wisdom is found in the Constitution, but as usurpation of jurisdiction rests on justified or unjustified custom and now has the force of constitutional prerogative, what just reason can be advanced against the right to set aside such decision by the same two-thirds vote with which we set aside the veto of an Executive who appoints Supreme Court judges? If the people by constitutional amendment place the responsibility with Congress, who can be heard to complain?

RECALLS OF CONGRESS AND EXECUTIVES.

The Constitution provides in its wisdom the Executives of the Government may be removed in four years, as evidenced by the 531 to 8 electoral-vote decision during the recent past, although no power can reach the same man when he is once placed on the bench. By the seventeenth amendment it is provided the Senate every six years shall go back to the people, not to State legislatures as formerly, and that Representatives shall go back biannually to receive their grant of authority. Why should not some control be had over the personnel of the court by those who represent the people?

A political party that cast 4,119,507 votes in 1912—11 times the Republican electoral vote 10 short years ago, carried in its platform, so supported, the following plank:

When an act passed under the police power of the State is held unconstitutional under the State constitution by the courts, the people shall have an opportunity to vote on the question whether they desire the act to become a law notwithstanding such decision.

Last month a conference met in Cleveland to advance progressive political action. Five hundred delegates from practically every State in the Union, claiming to represent millions of voters in farm and labor organizations, there issued a call to Congress based on overwhelming political changes they contributed to bring about at the recent election. One of the six planks adopted by that conference reads:

(3) That Congress end the power of the courts to declare legislation unconstitutional.

The unlimited power of the courts and the stand of the Progressive Party a decade ago finds recent expression in the platform drafted last month at Cleveland. What is the answer?

A bill heretofore introduced by an able lawyer and Senator (OWEN) with long service reads:

That from and after the passage of this act Federal judges are forbidden to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional. No appeal shall be permitted in any case in which the constitutionality of an act of Congress is challenged, the passage by Congress of any act being deemed conclusive presumption of the constitutionality of such act.

Protesting against a recent Supreme Court appointment, Senator LA FOLLETTE several days ago said in his magazine:

No student of existing conditions, however conservative he may be, can ignore the alarming fact that there is a widespread and growing suspicion in the public mind that our courts and kindred tribunals established to administer justice under the laws are more considerate of property interests than of personal rights. * * * It is no longer to be ignored by the profession nor by those having the appointing power to places on the bench. Out of it has come the demand for the recall of judges.

In speeches, arguments, and writings Senator LA FOLLETTE has constantly urged the necessity for a recall of judges and a review of decisions. His advice has been followed by criticisms, but he is in the company of ex-Presidents, judges, and is well able to stand alone.

Senator BORAH recently introduced a bill requiring seven judges of the Supreme Court to agree before a Federal law is set aside. Jury decisions ordinarily by law must be unanimous. Why not the courts when laws are set aside?

SACREDNESS OF JUDGES NO LONGER A SHIBBOLETH.

Unless there is some sacredness attached that may suggest a strong suspicion of ulterior motives for preventing removals under any circumstances, a resolution making decisions and judges subject to a two-thirds referendum or recall is worthy of consideration by the Congress.

If it would not be deemed too "radical" to quote a commonly misused term of reproach, I venture to offer for your consideration something to the following effect:

No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the Supreme Court without the concurrence of at least all but one of the judges.

A provision affecting the tenure of office of judges I submit might properly read:

Judges may be removed from office by concurrent resolutions of both Houses (of the Congress) if two-thirds of the Members elected to each House concur therein, but no such removal shall be made except upon complaint, the substance of which shall be entered on the journal, nor until the party charged shall have had notice thereof and an opportunity to be heard.

Both provisions, excepting the words in parentheses, are taken verbatim from the constitution of the State of Ohio, from a State that claims for its chief citizen the only man who can appoint judges and chief justices for life, and from the home State of the Chief Justice himself.

THE RACE TO THE COURT, FAST AND FURIOUS.

The growth of the court's "don't decisions" on "seeming laws" enacted by Congress has been fast and furious. Three cases were heard and three Federal laws declared unconstitutional during the first 70 years, or one in about every 23 years on the average. Of those so tried, two were of slight importance. Since that time, or during a period of practically 50 years, such decisions have reached on an average possibly one per year, and hundreds of State laws have been wiped out by the same tribunal. I have not the exact number, but believe this figure is not far wrong and that decisions declaring Federal laws unconstitutional are rendered twenty-three times as often now as in the days of the terrible but great Marshall.

Familiarity breeds or invites contempt, 'tis said, and we are becoming used to the court's chastening stick, but no record shows how many cases have been tested in court—some upheld, some dismissed, and others reversed. From the lower court to the highest the race now is constant. No law is certain in character to-day until litigants get the stamp of approval from the court, so these litigants and thousands who have acted or would act on the law are kept in a state of suspended animation until the court voices its approval or disapproval. In other words, to determine what is law or just "seems to be law." How long will Congress and the country subscribe to this un-American doctrine of judicial usurpation?

To what extent, we may well ask, will the policy lead in view of the arithmetical progression practiced during recent years, and can any more striking anomaly be conceived under our form of government than this anxious waiting, hat in hand, for months or years to get a 5 to 4 last guess on constitutional enactments?

A FEW CASES CITED FROM AMONG MANY CLOSE DECISIONS.

Widespread extension of the United States Supreme Court's constitutionally provided jurisdiction may be inferred from a few examples of divided decisions that overturn different laws of States and Nation. Only those are mentioned where the opinion of the court is fairly well divided:

United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S. 290, 1897), Sherman Antitrust Act; four dissenting.
United States v. Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S. 505, 1898), Sherman Antitrust Act; three dissenting.

Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart (253 U. S. 149, 1920), Federal law held unconstitutional; four dissenting.

Truax v. Corrigan (42 Sup. Ct., 1922), Arizona law held unconstitutional; four dissenting.

Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (158 U. S. 601, 1895), Federal income tax held unconstitutional; four dissenting.

Keller v. United States (213 U. S. 138, 1909), Federal law held unconstitutional; three dissenting.

Southern Railroad Co. v. Greene (213 U. S. 400, 1910), Alabama law held unconstitutional; four dissenting.

Louisville & Nashville Railway v. Stockyards (212 U. S. 131, 1909), Kentucky law held unconstitutional; three dissenting.

Ludurg v. Western Union Co. (216 U. S. 146, 1910), Arkansas law held unconstitutional; three dissenting.

Union Tank Line v. Wright (249 U. S. 275, 1919), Georgia law held unconstitutional; three dissenting.

Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232, 1921), overruling conviction of Newberry; four dissenting.

I have not quoted the Macomber stock-dividend case (252 U. S.) holding by 5 to 4 such dividends not taxable and thereby losing possibly a half billion dollars in tax revenues to the Treasury nor are many other cases cited because hard to classify. Many laws, State and National, have been held constitutional by only one vote of the court, and other proportionately narrow escapes in determining constitutionality are not cited nor are ordinances of cities mentioned that were set aside or affirmed by a divided court decision, many of which I have before me.

A most remarkable publication, printed under Government sanction, laid on our desks during the past week, is entitled "Labor laws that have been declared unconstitutional," issued by the United States Department of Labor. A review of decisions by State and Federal courts discloses that 300 separate statutes, bills, and ordinances have been set aside by the courts (p. 10). When it is remembered that hundreds of laws not affecting labor have been set aside by the courts, the wide range of assumed jurisdiction and judge-made laws resulting may well be understood.

The fostering care of one court over another (?) is announced by the United States Supreme Court when, in passing upon a decision of the New York Court of Appeals, it announced:

We will only say that, notwithstanding the decision comes from the highest court of the first State of the Union and is supported by most persuasive argument, we have not been able to yield our consent to the view there taken.

Enough has been offered of recent date to show that with increasing frequency the Supreme Court on great public questions previously decided by constitutionally elected bodies often evenly divides while one member of the court is now vested with power under present conditions to set aside laws left in force by an otherwise equally divided court. Both branches of Congress and the Executive who appointed the court are helpless to act, notwithstanding a strongly contended usurpation of constitutional prerogative exists in the court to-day. State legislatures and governors are equally impotent if one Federal Associate Justice throws his weight on one side or the other of the question.

CONCLUSIONS, IF REASONABLE, CALL FOR SOME REMEDY.

I have not assumed to present any original or technical argument nor urge that particular changes be adopted.

When no authority exists under the Constitution to reach this situation, either by Congress or the people, it remains for Congress to provide some relief for submission to the people. As a tentative suggestion it is proposed that decisions of the court declaring laws unconstitutional shall be practically unanimous or for recall of judges, or both, and it may be a salutary move to place a recall in the hands of two-thirds of Congress, thereby serving to keep the court fairly close to the will of the people. To this end I am suggesting a tentative amendment that would require two-thirds vote of both Houses to join in any proceeding affecting members of the court or of their decision, somewhat similar to the Ohio constitutional provision. If this proposed amendment invites consideration, I submit that ample grounds for its support may be found in the cases cited. More pertinent, it makes certain Article IV of the Constitution, which provides:

The Constitution and the laws of the United States * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the Judges of every State shall be bound thereby.

It reads "judges shall be bound thereby" without hairsplitting decisions over "supposed laws."

Pursuant to the same ark of the covenant we can not well misread section 2, Article III, that is couched in plain English:

The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

No higher authority need be cited, and no greater responsibility rests on Congress to-day, in my humble judgment, than to perform a plain duty under the Constitution.

Proposed joint resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

SECTION 1. Congress shall have power to determine how many members of the Supreme Court shall join in any decision that declares unconstitutional, sets aside, or limits the effect of any Federal or State law, and may further provide by law for the recall without impeachment proceedings of any judge of the court, or for a review and setting aside of any such court decision, providing that not less than two-thirds of the vote of both Houses shall agree to such recall or review.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, by previous arrangement, I understand that it is in order to call up unobjected-to bills on the Private Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. By special order bills unobjected to on the Private Calendar are in order to-day. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that they may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Private Calendar.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11397) to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is an omnibus war claims bill involving some 46 different claims. I think some explanation should be made by the chairman of the committee reporting it before the objection stage is passed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill was originally sent to the Speaker of the House to be presented to the War Claims Committee for consideration. It contained various private claims, and was intended to clear up all of the claims that were in the War Department that had been approved by the department but refused payment by the Comptroller General up to the time that we passed, last year, the special enabling act which gave the power to the War Department to consider and settle practically all such claims as are carried in this present omnibus bill.

In considering this bill the committee went over each claim very carefully. We tried not only to be fair to the individual claimants but also to protect the Government in every respect, and if we have erred at all I think we have erred in favor of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that if the committee have erred, they have erred by giving more generous treatment to these cases than they should have received?

Mr. SNELL. I mean just exactly the opposite, and most of the claimants at least will support my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought the gentleman would like to have that statement made.

Mr. SNELL. Many of these claims are printing claims. According to law no one has the right to cause any printing on behalf of the Government or any advertisement or insertion in any paper without written authority from the War Department. During the war there were a good many times when it was absolutely necessary for the officer in charge for the benefit of the Government to insert small advertisements on behalf of the Government. Each one of these claims except one is very small. It was done for the benefit of the Government, and there is absolutely no reason why the Government should not pay these bills except the technicality that was in the law.

The heading that covers the greater part of these claims is the loss of money by Army officers. During the war various officers were in control of sums of money used for pay rolls and other expenses. They had no special accommodation for taking care of this money, and it was necessary to leave it with a subordinate officer or with some civilian clerk, and generally the officer had no control in choosing such officer or clerk. In practically every case covered in this bill the officer himself really had nothing to do with the money. In almost all cases the person who stole the money or in some other way got away with it has been apprehended and is now in jail or has returned a part of the money; but notwithstanding that fact the officer himself is held responsible and has been asked to pay back the balance that has not been returned; that is, the officer in charge is technically responsible, regardless of any other conditions over which he has no control.

Sometimes in the foreign service they moved quickly and did not always have an opportunity to take all their belongings with them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. In these various claims, what action was taken by the department to secure the amount from surety companies?

Mr. SNELL. I think there is only one claim, if I remember correctly, where there was a bond, and a surety bond does not cover the Heilich case, which is, I believe, the one the gentleman has reference to. The Government bonds a man's honesty, and if a man is not dishonest, if he has been tried by court-martial and it has been shown that he is not guilty of any misdemeanor, and he is still in the service, that bond does not cover the case. It is simply when a man has been found guilty of wrongdoing and has been separated from the service that the bond covers the case. This man was proven innocent and without fault and is still in Government employ, and for that reason the bond has nothing to do with the case at all, and the bonding company receives no benefit under this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I had a case which I think reached the committee too late to be inserted in this bill. Major Hardin had a clerk assigned to him by the Civil Service whom he had no right to refuse to take. Major Hardin required him to have a bond, and he gave a surety bond for $5,000. The clerk stole $11,000. The surety bond was collected, but the Government wishes Major Hardin to pay the remaining $6,000. The dishonest clerk pleaded guilty to the charge and was sent to the penitentiary and within a few months was pardoned. I wanted to know if the gentleman would be willing to let that go into this bill. I would be glad to get it in if we could. It was approved by the department, but it was too late to get it into the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I will say that several people have come to me with the same kind of cases. I would not want to put into the bill any cases that have not been definitely passed upon by the committee and all the evidence presented to the committee in the usual way. We expect to have another day later on, and I would be glad then to consider the matter.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. McSWAIN. Is it the information of the gentleman that the War Claims Committee will have another day during this session?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; we are going to clean up the calendar.

Mr. McSWAIN. I want to say while I am on my feet, being a member of that committee, that as the chairman has explained, we thoroughly thrashed over all of these cases, and having had some slight experience with them I want to say that we reported nothing but that we felt the Government legally and honestly ought to pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman recollect the case of Colonel Newbold that was to come in in some omnibus bill?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know; this bill carries 68 claims and I have forgotten the names of all of them. If that one the gentleman speaks of was sent up by the War Department and is meritorious, it is in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it expected that you will have another batch of these small claims so that this might be included in those?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know that we will have another omnibus bill, yet there are a few other claims that we will have to bring in as private bills. It is the desire of the committee to cover all of the claims arising from the late war as fast as possible so that the legitimate claimants will get their money during their lifetime instead of the second and third generation, and so that the people who know about them can give their evidence.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to say that I commend that policy, but I am taken by surprise this morning, and have not the access to my files just now. Colonel Newbold is on duty in my State at Fort Ethan Allen, which is the reason for my being interested in his behalf. It is expected that he will go on foreign service within a month.

Mr. SNELL. I am just informed the case the gentleman from Vermont is interested in is in the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have not the floor.

Mr. LITTLE. Was Colonel Newbold in Switzerland at one time?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not tell the gentleman. I do not remember just what his service was.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the other claims are for rental of quarters where the individual officer did it under the direct command of his superior officer, and at no time was a larger amount paid than he would be allowed according to his rank and according to present law. But, owing to some technical question as to whether he was on duty with troops or not, the Comptroller General refused to pay the account. These, together with some other expenses connected with the observations made by some Army officers in foreign countries previous to our entry into the World War, comprised a majority of the claims taken up in the general bill. I will say for the committee that we have gone into these claims carefully. I myself have personally read all the evidence, and we have not put in a single bill in this general bill where there is a weak link in evidence. Everything is in favor of the Government.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman says he expects to have another day to consider these bills. We all know the congestion of the calendars in both Houses, and I sincerely hope that the gentleman will not have one day but many days in order that we may clear the calendars of these bills, and especially those that have passed the Senate which are meritorious and have been considered year after year.

Mr. SNELL. It is expected to clean up the entire Private Calendar at this session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the exhaustive explanation made by the chairman of the committee and the detailed and earnest study that seems to have been given to these omnibus claims, and having gone over them somewhat myself, I feel that the objection should be withdrawn, and I hereby withdraw it.

Mr. SNELL. The following is a condensed statement of the bill and amounts carried:

The amendment was agreed to.

Cady (formerly acting dental surgeon) the sum of $127.61, being the amount paid by him from private funds for rent of quarters for the period October 14, 1913, to January 31, 1914, for his use while in the service of the United States.

Twelfth. Relief of H. D. Cory (formerly captain, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army): That the Comptroller General of the United

Thirteenth. Relief of Capt. Richard D. Daugherty, Forty-eighth Infantry, United States Army (now first lieutenant, Infantry): That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to reimburse Capt. Richard D. Daugherty, Forty-eighth Infantry (now first lieutenant, Infantry), in the sum of $256.91, representing public funds for which he was responsible as agent officer which were stolen by Capt. John A. Fourteenth. Relief of Major Charles B. Elliott: That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of Maj. Charles B. Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to page 7, line 7, to strike out the word "Marjor."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 7, strike out the word "Marjor" and insert the word "Major."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask a question. There has been quite a loss to the Government both during the war and since on these defaults and others. The gentleman speaks about the bonds not being sufficient to meet the Government's claim. Ought not the committee to take some action toward requiring a different kind of bond that shall be given in the future, so that it will meet the losses that occur? There have been quite a number of other losses of different natures not covered by this bill. This bill alone covers about $69,000. It does seem to me that the Government ought not to be losing these big amounts of money every year through the dishonesty of some of its officers.

Mr. SNELL. I do not think there are a great many of them.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there are a great many that are not covered by the gentleman's bill.

Mr. SNELL. Not very many, so far as I know, that come to our committee.

Mr. BLANTON. They have not yet come to the gentleman's committee, and that is the reason.

Mr. SNELL. This bill covers everything of that nature in the War Department up to the time they sent it up here, and that was last fall.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the committee ought to take some action toward getting a different kind of bond which shall be given in the future, so that the Government would be made whole.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fifteenth. Relief of Capt. Lewis J. Emery, Quartermaster Officers' Reserve Corps, United States Army: That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Capt. Lewis J. Emery, Quartermaster Officers' Reserve Corps, the sum of $139, being the value of silver coins lost through unavoidable accident during the transfer of funds at Cristobal, Canal Zone, on August 6, 1917, for which the said Captain Emery was accountable.

Sixteenth. Relief of Joe P. Esslinger (formerly captain, One hundred and sixty-seventh Infantry, United States Army): That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Joe P. Esslinger (formerly captain, One hundred and sixty-seventh Infantry) the sum of $620, representing public funds which were stolen from him on or about August 9, 1918, and to reimburse him in such amount as he has refunded to the United States to make good the loss of these public funds.

Thomas Feeney, Cavalry, United States Army (now sergeant, detached enlisted men's list): That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Capt. Nineteenth. Relief of Capt. Frank Geere, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army (now major, Coast Artillery Corps): That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Capt. Frank Geere, Quartermaster Corps (now major, Coast Artillery Corps), the sum of $29, being the amount found by him to be deficient in a shipment of $116,000 received on or about August 26, 1916, from the subtreasury at New Orleans, La., for which the said Captain Geere was accountable, and which amount of $29 he has refunded to the United States to make good the shortage in these public funds.

Page 22, line 19, strike out "$686.24" and insert in lieu thereof "$699.68."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Under what authority were these advertisements made in these various newspapers all over the United States?

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman had been here when I made my statement, he would have understood that the reason they had to come here is because they were inserted without authority by the commanding general. They were not in strict accordance with the laws of the War Department, and for that reason the Comptroller General would not pay them.

Mr. BLANTON. They were not, in fact, authorized Government business?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, absolutely; they were for Government business, and the Government had the full benefit of everything connected with it, and they had the approval of everybody in connection with the United States Government, but there was a technicality, as I explained, and the Comptroller General would not pay them. That is the reason they are here for authorization.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the bill H. R. 13660, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, ask for a conference, and that the Speaker appoint the conferees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the table the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, and that the Speaker appoint the conferees.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, yesterday the statement was made that no business would be transacted except these private pension claims and these other claims. I am not just sure, but if that is true it occurs to me that this matter ought not to be called up to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that I was not present when such an agreement was made, and if such an agreement was made—

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. The statement was made—

Mr. BLANTON. But a conference report is in order to be called up at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been the custom of the House to give the right of way to conference reports.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask this question, Mr. Speaker. Knowing the gentleman as well as I do, it is hardly necessary, but is the gentleman going to permit all of these various increases to stay in this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not unless the House forces me to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. The attitude of the gentleman is to cut out every one of these amendments?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would not want to say I could accomplish all of that.

Mr. BLANTON. But that will be the endeavor of the gentleman?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the bill would be improved if that were accomplished.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to say that unless the gentleman can keep them out, why the Members of this branch might just as well resign and go home and let the business be transacted at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. CRAMTON. I appreciate there is some force in what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHARLES S. FRIES.

The next bill in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2445) for the relief of Charles S. Fries.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4390. An act to amend the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of June 3, 1922.

S. 4346. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Delaware State Highway Department to construct a bridge across the Nanticoke River.

S. 4113. An act for the relief of Helene M. Layton.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6294) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico.

ALLOWING CREDITS IN THE ACCOUNTS OF CERTAIN DISBURSING OFFICERS, ETC.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11528) to allow credits in the accounts of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before the objection stage is passed I think we ought to have some explanation of this omnibus claims bill from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the general statement I made in connection with the first bill (H. R. 11397) will apply to this bill. These all came to the committee from the department at one time and in one bill, and I separated them into two bills for this reason: There was no money appropriated under House bill 11528. It is merely a bookkeeping proposition in the War Department and General Accounting Department. It is simply for the purpose of straightening out these individual accounts, and the department itself knows that these credits to these officers should be allowed, but on account of the technicalities of the law they can not do it, but these charges are so obviously wrong that the department has never tried to make the individual officers pay them back. But they need this authorization to balance the accounts of the officers and give them a clean record.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the special attention of the chairman of the committee to the item No. 7, to Maj. Albert J. Bowley, credit in the sum of $301.27, now disallowed against him, which he expended during the period of July 1, 1912, to June 30, 1914, while serving as military attaché at Peking, China. The report shows as to this claim:

The remainder, $196.04, of the aforementioned $301.27 was paid as cost of exchange, and was disallowed for the reason that it did not represent the actual loss to the exchange, but was based on the rate stated on the Treasury Department circular prepared by the Director of the Mint.

Am I to understand from the statement in the report that you are going to allow this Major Bowley $196 in excess of what was the actual cost of the exchange?

Mr. SNELL. No. As I understand that is the rate they were paying at that time. That was the order from the department, and they complied with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; but there is a certain rate of exchange which was in excess of the actual cost. He was only allowed in his credits the amount of the actual loss of the exchange expenses. Now—

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand it the same as the gentleman. I do not understand that he was allowed anything. The whole matter was the adjusting of necessary expenses that were incurred, and where more than the 7 cents per mile allowance under the law, which would have been manifestly unfair under the conditions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I do not read the report that way. Of course, the gentleman reported the bill and he is better acquainted with the facts.

Mr. SNELL. This is an item that caused some trouble, but we thought, after full and careful consideration, that the officer was entitled to this allowance, and this position was concurred in by everyone acquainted with the facts. It is simply a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have not analyzed all of these claims with a microscopic glass, but this item rather makes me skeptical as to whether all the claims are meritorious. I have great confidence in the chairman of the committee. He has stated on the floor that he has gone over these claims individually and passed upon them. If he believes they should be paid, I shall not set up my opinion against his superior knowledge.

Mr. SNELL. I am prepared to reiterate again that I have gone over these claims and, in the best of my judgment, these claims should be paid, and in making this statement I believe I am acting in the best interests of the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, in the settlement of the accounts of the following-named disbursing officers of the Army of the United States, to allow credit in the sums herein stated now standing as disallowances in said accounts on the books of the General Accounting Office:

Twenty-fifth. Capt. Orrin R. Wolfe, Quartermaster Corps (now colonel of Infantry), credit in the sum of $40, now disallowed against him, which he expended in 1911.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 2, line 19, in the fourth item, strike out the word "February" and insert in lieu thereof the word "March."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN F. HOMEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7322) for the relief of John F. Homen.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John F. Homen, of San Antonio, Tex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full settlement of his claim against the Government of the United States for the serious injury caused by being struck by a Government truck operated by a soldier of the United States Army on July 4, 1919, in San Antonio, Tex.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANCES MARTIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10047) for the relief of Frances Martin.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object to this bill. During my service in the House, I have introduced but one bill referred to this committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I will withhold.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, in 1918, an epidemic of the flu broke out in this country, and at that time there were thousands of soldiers in training at Camp Sherman, down in Ross County, Ohio, in the district I have the honor to represent. Many of those soldiers were afflicted with this disease. They died at the rate of about 160 per day, and the undertakers and embalmers down there were so overtaxed that they could not take care of the bodies of the deceased soldiers to save their lives. I saw with my own eyes the bodies of 500 dead soldiers piled up in a livery stable in Chillicothe because the embalmers and undertakers could not take care of these bodies and prepare them for burial. The War Department was unable to cope with the situation. An Army officer was sent to Columbus, Ohio, to solicit embalmers and undertakers, and Peter Leslie Martin, an undertaker, 32 years of age, residing there, volunteered to go down there and render service. He did render effective service, but after several days he became infected with blood poisoning. Several months afterwards he died of the disease he had contracted, and left a wife and a little boy 11 years old without a dollar in the world to live upon, whereas, when he went down to Chillicothe, he was receiving a salary of $4,000 a year. If it had not been for the service he rendered to the country and to the War Department in that epidemic, he would to-day, no doubt, be living and be drawing $4,000 a year and be able to take care of his wife and child. But he is gone, never to return, and his good wife and little son are bereft of his care and support. Now, the committee has considered this bill twice. They reported it out once before, but it was not reached on the calendar, and, consequently, was not considered. It is here before the House to-day by the unanimous report of the committee, and I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection. It is a meritorious case if there ever was one.

I think the committee in awarding the sum of $5,000 has given this widow a very small amount in comparison with the great loss she sustained in the death of her husband who, prompted by his patriotism, went down to that camp and rendered this very valuable service to the country in its distress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. How much is given by the bill?

Mr. RICKETTS. Five thousand dollars. I think she ought to have had $10,000. That poor woman has been working here and there and yonder and everywhere, trying to support herself and her child. Her husband was only 32 years of age. In the prime of life, but she has lost his services because of his loyalty to his country in time of stress.

Mr. BLANTON. We have just reimbursed a man in San Antonio for injuries received by being hit by a Government truck. Shall we not reimburse this widow?

Mr. RICKETTS. There is no reason why we should not. There is no question about the proof in this case. It is absolutely established here beyond question that this man rendered the service, and was rather pressed into the service by an Army officer, and died from the effect of the disease incurred while performing this service.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has objected to the consideration of this claim, but in order to give me time to make a statement with reference thereto he has reserved his right to object. I sincerely hope that he will not make an objection to the consideration of this bill at this time. This poor woman and little son need this money badly, and while there is no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay the amount allowed by this committee to this mother and son, yet equity demands that justice be done in the premises.

The Government of the United States received the service. The service was necessary. It was rendered at the time of its greatest crisis. The Congress has been passing bills of similar nature, and there is ample precedent for the consideration and passage of this bill, and I urge upon you, gentlemen of the House, and especially upon the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], that the bill be given due and proper consideration and that same may be passed at this time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word about this claim in particular and claims of this character. Originally, when this claim was reported in the Sixty-sixth Congress, I opposed it. I was a member of the committee at that time. But during the Sixty-sixth Congress and also so far during this Congress I have found that the Congress itself has adopted a very generous policy in dealing with claims of this character. In the early part of the session when claims of this character were taken up on the Private Calendar I raised the point on the floor of the House each time that there were several claims of similar nature before the War Claims Committee and I was holding them until the House itself made up its mind what its policy would be in regard to similar claims. Each time I called the attention of the House to it. This is one of the best claims of that character that has come before this House, either this year or in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

The statement of facts is exactly as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] has put them before you. And considering the fact that we have been very generous in passing claims of this character where perhaps there is no legal liability on the part of the Government, and as long as we have adopted this policy and have done it in several other cases and probably will do it in several more, it is my judgment that this claim should be considered and passed at this time. The committee has reduced it from $25,000, as offered in the original bill, to $5,000, and I shall urge that amendment if the bill is considered.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WATSON. Did the Government promise this man compensation when he offered his services?

Mr. SNELL. The Government did not promise him a single penny. The Army officers testified that they went to get undertakers, and several of them stated that if they could not get them to volunteer they were going to bring them any way.

Mr. WATSON. He voluntarily offered his services?

Mr. SNELL. These Army officers went up there and told him the condition, and he and two or three others from this same town of Columbus, Ohio, offered their services and went down and did the work.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. For that reason he was entitled to more credit, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. SNELL. And afterwards the Army officer said, "I was going to take you anyway if you had not offered your services."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of objection, I wish to say that there are facts in this case which differentiate it from others. That is, this man might not be considered an independent contractor. He was in the undertaking business and he received pay as a result of his service. If I were certain that this man contracted with the Government to do this work and suffered loss as a result of his individual work, I should feel constrained to insist upon the objection. But I wish to take as liberal a view of these cases as possible consistent with the practice that has been indulged in, and also desiring not to establish a precedent when it is likely to haunt us.

If this case goes by, it will go by with the understanding, so far as I am concerned, that this man was not an independent contractor of the Government and did not suffer injury while doing some work connected with that independent contract, but that he was virtually commandeered to perform a humanitarian duty to the Government to aid them in providing for the burial of these thousands of soldier boys who were stricken with the "flu" at Camp Sherman, at Chillicothe, Ohio.

Mr. SNELL. I can assure the gentleman that if these people had not volunteered the Army officers were authorized by the commandant of the camp to take them down there.

Mr. STAFFORD. That differentiates this case from the kind of case that I was speaking of. If it was an individual contractor I should not be willing to allow the precedent to be established, that when a person undertakes employment with the Government and suffers an injury he or his next of kin have a claim against the Government for compensation. Under the circumstances stated by the author of the bill, and with the understanding that the committee amendment will be agreed to and the original amount of $25,000 reduced to $5,000, I will withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Frances Martin, widow of Peter Leslie Martin, of Logan, Hocking County, Ohio, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000 as compensation and relief for the loss by death on March 31, 1919, in Grant Hospital, Columbus, State of Ohio, of her husband, Peter Leslie Martin, who, on October 5, 1918, volunteered his services as an undertaker to the Government during the epidemic of influenza, at which time he went to Camp Sherman, in the State of Ohio, to assist in taking care of the bodies of the soldiers, who died in great numbers by reason of said epidemic; and that during the discharge of his duties he became infected with blood poisoning, from which he died.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 7, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$5,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EDWIN GANTNER.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2556) for the relief of Edwin Gantner.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I should like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. I reported this measure from the Committee on the Public Lands, and I shall be very glad to explain the purpose of the bill. Its introduction was recommended by the Interior Department, and it was favorably reported upon by the department after being introduced by Senator KENDRICK. The returned soldier who entered this land became totally disabled, and is now in a hospital. It is therefore impossible for him to comply with the requirement of residence. He must comply with all the other provisions of the homestead law, and the record shows that he has already expended over $800 on the development of this claim.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue a patent to Edwin Gantner upon homestead entry, Newcastle 025304, embracing the west one-half section 26, and the north one-half section 27, township 52 north, range 74 west, sixth principal meridian, made by said Edwin Gantner, without requiring further residence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MADDEN). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

FANNY M. HIGGINS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1750) for the relief of Fannie M. Higgins.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold the objection to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. My purpose in making a statement is to try to induce the gentleman to withdraw his objection to the bill, so that it may be passed to-day. I did not know anything about the bill before reading the report; but upon reading the report and upon an examination of the affidavits it appears to me that there was clearly negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile which struck Mr. Higgins, who was killed, and for whose widow relief is sought here. Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this: I understand that a bill was passed a moment ago that was based on substantially the same facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. We do not want to extend this discussion too long. The report shows that the injured person failed to exercise reasonable care. If he had been exercising reasonable care I would interpose no objection.

Mr. BOX. If the gentleman will yield, the facts are that this man, the deceased, walked into the street in the dark; it was foggy and rainy in the early morning. To his left, some distance away, he saw the headlights of an automobile which was being carelessly driven without the driver keeping a lookout. It was not moving toward the point where the collision occurred. The only negligence was by the man being in the street when there was an automobile coming up the street. When he got near the street-car track the automobile, which had been driving halfway between the track and the curb because of another vehicle appearing in the street, turned to the left of the course it had been going, and turned to the left quickly and struck him.

I know that one of the Army authorities, probably General Crowell, in reviewing the report, said that he was guilty of negligence. I went over the facts very carefully, and I find absolutely no fact that warrants the conclusion that he was negligent. I would like to have the gentleman indicate one act of the deceased showing that he was guilty of any negligence.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case of the deceased, who was a Government employee—

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Oh, no; he was working at the Potomac yards.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I am in error as to that, but prior to the accident he was found to have incipient tuberculosis. He was not killed outright, he lived for some time after the accident. The report shows that the accident may have accentuated his tubercular trouble. I rely, as the gentleman has stated, upon the statement of the Acting Secretary of War, General Crowell, in his letter of April 1, 1920, in which he says this:

The attached papers indicate very clearly that Mr. Higgins was partially responsible for the accident, and as his death was due partly to tuberculosis contracted prior to the accident, I am of the opinion that, although congressional action affording relief is just, the amount specified in the bill is an excessive compensation.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. That was $10,000, and it has been reduced by the committee to $5,000.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield? The deceased had incipient tuberculosis some years before, which had been arrested. It was in the initial stage. It did not disable him.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Permit me to call attention to the report of Doctor Noland, who says:

Having treated J. H. Higgins at intervals for several years I am in a position to know his physical condition. Three or four years ago I had occasion to examine above named and found him suffering with a very slight chronic fibroid phthisis, determined only after microscopic examination of sputum. This condition, apparently, in the years following was causing no ill effects, as he was able to work every day. He was injured and died from acute tuberculosis. The injury to his chest could very easily have broken the fibrous capsule, allowing the bacilli free access to lung tissue, and owing to the resulting poor resisting powers of body had full sway to do its damage; that is, the involvement of new sound lung tissue with an acute tuberculosis arising causing death.

Had it not been for the injury he would to-day have been in comparatively good health, performing his duties, and lived indefinitely.

Mr. BOX. There are many other facts in the record pointing in the same direction. The deceased had worked 308 days the preceding year, 304 days the preceding year to that, and he had worked regularly for some years. He was strong, and there was no disability, no loss of time. After the injury, which broke a leg, split the bone near the ankle, injured him in the breast, he was confined in the hospital for some months. While wounded and disabled acute tuberculosis developed. All of these facts have been gone into thoroughly, and I would be glad if the gentleman from Wisconsin would permit the case to be considered. I think it is meritorious.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the facts which the gentleman asked me to state to warrant the conclusion that he was in no wise responsible for the accident, I wish to read this from the report:

Higgins saw the automobile approaching from some distance away when he was actually on the street in the act of crossing, but it was not then moving in the direction of the point at which it struck him and he paid no further attention to it.

He was on the south side of the crossing at Fourteenth and C Streets SW., attempting to get a car going south that would stop on the north side of the street. He saw the truck approaching. It was hazy and misty, but he made no attempt whatever to get out of the way.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. It is an undisputed fact that Mr. Higgins was struck between the street-car tracks on the eastern side of Fourteenth Street. There is a double track on that street. The undisputed evidence is that when he saw the automobile coming it was halfway between the curb and the eastern rail of the nearest street-car track. If the automobile had continued in the direction in which he then saw it, it could not by any possibility have struck him. If the gentleman will permit, I will read what the driver of the automobile says in the statement that he made to Mr. Tyson, who investigated the accident for the War Department. He says:

Q. State the particulars of the accident that happened to J. H. Higgins, Washington, D. C.—A. I left Alexandria, Va., where I was stationed, about 5:50 or 6 a. m. to meet Captain White at Union Station, Washington, D. C., on January 2, 1919. It was between 6 and 6:30 a. m. when the accident occurred. It was dark and raining hard that morning, and water was running down the wind shield of my car. As I arrived at locality of accident, as shown on Exhibit A, a street car was coming south on Fourteenth Street SW., Washington, D. C., and was near B Street, or a half a block or more away. It had a very bright light and blinded me. I could only see a little directly in front of me. I glimpsed a bread wagon only about 10 yards ahead of me and turned quickly to the left to miss it. The bread wagon was going north and about ready to turn to right on C Street, as shown on Exhibit A. I was going north on Fourteenth Street and about halfway between the curb of street and first street-car track on right side of street. When I turned to miss the bread wagon I felt a jar and knew that I had struck something. I stopped as quick as possible, about the north corner of C and Fourteenth Streets, as marked on Exhibit A. After I stopped I backed a little to get off what was under my car, and he hallooed for me to stop, and I did. I got out and helped another man get him out and carry him in the house.

According to his testimony, immediately upon turning out from the direction in which he was going in order to pass that bread wagon he struck this man. His lights were burning; he did not blow his horn; he gave no signal; he was not looking out for a man crossing the street at a place where persons were reasonably and ordinarily expected to cross the street in order to take the street car on the other side.

Just one thing more. The evidence of an eyewitness is to the same effect, except that from his evidence and from other evidence it is clear that the bread wagon had turned into C Street, and was not in front of the automobile as it approached. The result is that there was nothing between the automobile and the injured man; there was no reason why the driver of this automobile, exercising the care that he should have been exercising, should not have seen that man.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact in law that when it becomes apparent to a man driving a motor vehicle that he can not see in front of him if he continues he is guilty of gross negligence?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. He must exercise that care and diligence which the conditions impose upon him and that this driver did not do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, supporting what I said a moment ago is the report of Judge Advocate General Crowder. In his report on this case, in a letter dated March 9, he states that the board of inquiry found that the driver was not at fault and that Higgins was at fault. I am accepting the report of the board of inquiry; and I object.

CLYDE STEAMSHIP CO., OF NEW YORK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11571) for the relief of the Clyde Steamship Co., of New York, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MADDEN). Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

J. W. GLIDDEN AND E. F. HOBBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2702) for the relief of J. W. Glidden and E. F. Hobbs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $267.32 to J. W. Glidden and E. F. Hobbs, of Lawrence, Kans., to reimburse them for money necessarily expended in connection with their contract with the Government for the improvement of Huron Cemetery, an Indian reservation in Kansas City, Kans., in defending their interests in suits brought by the Connelley sisters, Indian wards of the Government, to prevent them from carrying out their contract with the United States Government in improving the Huron Cemetery, in Kansas City, Kans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOSÉ A. DE LA TORRIENTE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 47) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. José A. de la Torreiente, a citizen of Cuba.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. José A. de la Torreiente, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said José A. de la Torreiente shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and the said José A. de la Torreiente shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire recognition. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it will be wise or not, but under recent developments here in Washington it might be well to place some restriction upon this young man to make sure that he will not bring with him a supply of beverages the possession and use and sale of which is prohibited by law in this country. At least he ought to be made to understand that there is a law here that will prevent him from doing that, and that he is expected when he comes into this country to obey the law. If those from his country who are in higher authority permit gross disobedience of our law here in the Capital, it is not very far out of the range of possibility for underlings to do it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. We have information that this young man is a prohibitionist.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRAIG). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

WILLEM VAN DOORN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the resolution (H. J. Res. 281) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., Willem van Doorn, a subject of the Netherlands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be laid upon the table, as it has already been agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

GREY SKIPWITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6538) for the relief of Grey Skipwith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, I think we should have some explanation of the reason why it is intended to give these gentleman an additional grade.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] to make the statement in regard to this bill, but before doing so I call the attention of the House to the fact that if there is one thing which the membership of the House Committee on Naval Affairs has opposed in almost every instance to my knowledge it is the advancement of men on the retired list. However, a study of the facts in this case I am confident will disclose that an error was made by the department authorities, and, as a matter of fact, when that man became eligible for retirement under the seniority rule in 1917 he was physically incapacitated and should at that time have been retired with the rank of commander.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why was he not retired at that time when he had the opportunity?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Because he was engaged in the service on the Pacific, and there was no physical way by which he could attend the retiring board.

There was no way he could be examined. The circumstances were beyond his control. We were in war. He could not get to the board. It is not his fault, and he was anxious to be examined.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask a question, and ask it for information, and perhaps the gentleman from Indiana can enlighten the committee. Was this officer retired for physical disability?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If he had had an opportunity to appear before the naval retiring board to take an examination—

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want the gentleman from Wisconsin to listen to this.

Mr. McKENZIE. Under the practice in the Navy, if he had failed on the examination he could have been promoted to the higher grade and retire.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under the existing law, if he had gone before this board he would have retired in the grade we now ask, whether he failed or not. In other words, if he passed he would have been so retired, and if he failed, then, on account of physical infirmity, he would have been so retired. Simply because he could not appear before the board there results this injustice.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask this question to bring out one point. I think the gentleman from Indiana is correct in this matter, and that is, the officer has been done an injustice under the existing law; but I do not contend, and I want to say now, not to affect this bill, because I do not think this man's right would be affected by it, but there is no question but the laws of retirement in the Navy should be revised.

Mr. BUTLER. Before we yield to my young colleague [Mr. Vinson], who has this bill in charge, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois, as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin, that all of these bills have been examined with great care. So far as I know it is the policy of the Committee on Naval Affairs not to promote men upon retirement unless there is some extraordinary reason why, and I think this is one of them. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Montague] to give the facts. I think an injustice has been done this man.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there may be in this case some special reason which warrants the granting of the additional grade to this officer, particularly due to the fact that he was engaged in service during the war, so I will not press the objection further, but there are some bills later on reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs that I do not think have the meritorious claim of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lieut. Commander Grey Skipwith, Supply Corps, United States Navy, who was eligible for promotion to the grade of pay inspector with rank of commander prior to the 1st day of July, 1918, and who was subsequently found physically not qualified for promotion and then retired in the rank of lieutenant commander, shall be deemed to have been retired in the rank he would have attained if the act of the 1st of July, 1918, extending promotion by selection to the staff corps of the Navy had not been enacted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THEMIS CHRIST.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8046) for the relief of Themis Christ.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of the objection, I think some explanation should be made of this bill.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, it gives me much pleasure to give the gentleman from Wisconsin an explanation which will show this is a very meritorious bill. This bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. Butler], and unanimously reported by the subcommittee to the full committee, as you will find if you examine the record in the case. Themis Christ served 10 years as a carpenter on the U. S. S. Hector in the naval auxiliary service.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire right there why he did not become a citizen until he was discharged from the naval service in 1917?

Mr. VINSON. Probably due to the reason he could not get an opportunity to make application—

Mr. STAFFORD. On the high seas for 10 years and not reaching port?

Mr. VINSON. Not by any means; but he is a citizen now; he applied for citizenship—

Mr. STAFFORD. After he was discharged?

Mr. VINSON. He filed his declaration in 1904 and did not get his papers until 1917. He enlisted in the service in 1907. He was injured in 1917, when the ship was sunk off the coast of Carolina. Under the pension laws he is not entitled to a pension, because the Naval Auxiliary Service are not enlisted in the service, so he is prevented from getting that benefit.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take it it is the purpose of the committee to have this compensation date from the time of the passage of the act?

Mr. VINSON. Of course, that is what it says.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does it say so?

Mr. VINSON. The provisions of the act—

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say so.

Mr. VINSON. The act does not give compensation except from the date of the enactment of the law here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we had better safeguard it, as it is the intention of the committee, I take it—

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is entirely within his privilege, of course. I introduced this bill because this man did not have anyone else to introduce it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman has just stated, the compensation should date from the passage of the act.

Mr. BUTLER. If there is no objection, we can amend the bill right here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not the intention of the committee to have this compensation date from the passage of this act?

Mr. BUTLER. I should say so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to ascertain the view of the Committee on Naval Affairs as to whether this should date from the passage of the act or be retroactive. Is that the intent of the committee?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, yes; it does that under the language of the bill and under the language of the act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does it say so in the language of the bill? I asked the gentleman before to point that out, but he did not.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. I believe my colleague is exactly right, because the compensation this man will receive will not be under the war risk insurance act but under the employees' compensation act, where the compensation is due every month.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the wording here he could receive this money from the time of the injury. The bill says "that he be paid such sums as would properly be due him within the provisions of section 4 of the said act of September 7, 1916." That is a construction this bill would have, to have a retroactive force going back to that time.

Mr. VINSON. Under the general law this man Themis Christ is not eligible to compensation. Therefore if you enact the law now, his eligibility will only date from the date of the passage of the act and not from the injury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid ambiguity and in view of the statements of all the members of the committee, I will offer an amendment later and will now withdraw the reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States receiving injuries in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," are hereby extended to Themis Christ for loss of his left leg while employed in the naval auxiliary service, as a result of the wreck of the U. S. S. Hector, in the year 1916, and that he be paid such sums as would properly be due him within the provisions of section 4 of the said act of September 7, 1916. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in compliance with the terms of the said act of September 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission. Any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated for the purpose of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 1, line 10, after the word "sums," insert "to date from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 10, after the word "sums," insert the words "to date from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VINSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

A. E. ACKERMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6358) authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to A. E. Ackerman the pay and allowances of his rank for services performed prior to the approval of his bond by the Secretary of the Navy.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to pay to A. E. Ackerman, late lieutenant (junior grade), Supply Corps, United States Naval Reserve Force, the pay and allowances of his rank for the period he performed active duty in the third naval district prior to the approval of his bond by the Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ALICE P. DEWEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7921) granting six months' pay to Alice P. Dewey.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment while I explain the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I will withhold.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, the deceased soldier, Rupert C. Dewey, was a lieutenant colonel in the United States Marine Corps, and died after having given the Government 20 years' service out of the best part of his life. For his efficiency he was commended in official orders. He left a widow and two small children for her to raise and educate, and very little, if any, means with which to take care of them.

You know how officers of the Army and Navy live; they are not able to save money during their active duty, and they look forward to the retired pay to take care of them in their old age. This man, although he had served 20 years already in the active service, never had the benefit of a day's pay on the retired list.

It is the policy of Congress, as declared in its laws, to give a gratuity to the widow of Army and Marine officers on the death of an officer in the Government service. It has been the law for a number of years.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of giving six months' pay to the wife and children of every enlisted man who died during this interim?

Mr. SWING. What I want to show is simply—

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. SWING. I think I am.

Mr. BLANTON. He does not want to discriminate in favor of this one officer as against other officers and all enlisted men likewise affected during this period?

Mr. KRAUS. There is no discrimination. That is the law to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the law to-day?

Mr. KRAUS. The next of kin of deceased enlisted men and officers gets six months' pay.

Mr. SWING. If dependent.

Mr. KRAUS. Yes; if dependent.

Mr. SWING. This policy had been declared by Congress a good many years ago. Then when the war broke out they passed the war risk insurance act, and it was held that the provisions therein made superseded this provision, because those who died during the World War would, of course, be taken care of under that act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Here are the facts: There is an interim of two years during which the dependents of officers and of enlisted men in the marine service do not receive a six months' gratuity. This is one of the officers who died during that two years' interval. There are other men, enlisted men, who died during that interim whose dependent relatives, wife and little children, are just as much entitled to this six months' gratuity as this officer's wife and children. Why does not the gentleman have a general law passed that will cover this two years' interim for all such officers and enlisted men likewise affected? That will place all on an equality. That will do justice to all of them.

Mr. SWING. I would favor that. But in the meantime there is no reason for denying this relief to this widow. This war risk insurance law was passed containing no express repeal of this provision which Congress had declared as its policy, but after it had been enacted for a year or two, some one down here in some of the departments—the comptroller, probably—adjusted his glasses and said, "This is an implied repeal of the law giving the widow a gratuity for six months." As soon as Congress learned of that decision it reenacted the law. A month before this man's death it reenacted it for the benefit of the Army, and as soon as the Naval Committee could get to it they reported and had passed a bill restoring it to the marine officers.

Mr. BLANTON. This man being a lieutenant colonel in the marines, and having died during this two years' interim, his relatives are able to appeal to their very distinguished Representative in Congress, and he gets action for them. But there may be a good many dependent relatives of the ordinary private or the ordinary enlisted man in the marine service who are not able to get a hearing from their Representatives. They may not know about it. Does not the gentleman think that, in order to reach the proposition, to have a general provision passed, applicable to all, would be the better way; to wait and have a blanket bill passed?

Mr. SWING. I would like to see that, but here is a widow with two small children for whom she has to buy bread and clothing, and whom she has to educate. Do you say that you want to make her and the children suffer until you can bring in the other bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any such bill pending now to cover all such cases—I mean any proposed law?

Mr. SWING. I do not know. If this man, instead of being a lieutenant colonel in the marines—and that is one of the finest corps in the United States service—

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman—

Mr. SWING. If he had been in the Army, I would not now be here and his widow would have gotten this money long ago; but, because he was in the marines instead of being in the Army, we have got to come here and beg for this widow and these little children to get what Congress intended they should have by express provision of law, because it reenacted the law as soon as the alleged repeal was brought to its attention.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with you on the proposition to treat them all alike.

Mr. BUTLER. But hereafter they will be provided for under the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the condition which makes this bill a meritorious one.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SWING. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Alice P. Dewey, widow of Rupert C. Dewey, late lieutenant colonel, United States Marine Corps, is hereby allowed an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Rupert C. Dewey was receiving at the date of his death.

SEC. 2. That said Alice P. Dewey, widow of Rupert C. Dewey, lieutenant colonel, United States Marine Corps, as aforesaid, be paid out of the Treasury of the United States a sum of money or an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Rupert C. Dewey, deceased, was receiving at the date of his death.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out section 2.

Mr. SWING. What is the gentleman's purpose in making that motion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 2 is superfluous. Section 3 provides for the payment of this money out of the appropriation for beneficiaries of officers who die while on the active list of the Marine Corps, for which special authorization is made. Section 2 is merely supplementary. It provides that this money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and section 3 provides that it shall be paid out of the appropriation for the beneficiaries of officers.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the effect of taking out section 2?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 2 is supplemental to section 3. One or the other should go out.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not take out section 3?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 3 provides for the payment of the money out of the general appropriation carried in the naval appropriation bill. I think it is better for section 2 to go out, because in the administration of the law it will be under the Navy Department. They have the funds available and they will pay it.

Mr. BUTLER. I wonder if they will?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Section 2 indicates where it is to be paid from, while section 3 indicates that the appropriation is already made out of which to pay it. Suppose you cut out that section, will there not have to be an appropriation made to pay it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; the appropriation is running under the general appropriation act.

Mr. FESS. That is the only point I have in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. These matters are paid out of the general appropriation bill. Section 3 reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the payment of the amount of money hereby allowed and authorized to be paid to said Alice P. Dewey is authorized to be made from the appropriations for beneficiaries of officers who die while on the active list of the Marine Corps.

Mr. FESS. I think that covers it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out section 2.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next section.

The Clerk read section 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the section number will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Hicks, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ANTON KUNZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6832) granting six months' pay to Anton Kunz, father of Joseph Anthony Kunz, deceased, machinist's mate, first class, United States Navy, in active service.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Anton Kunz, father of Joseph Anthony Kunz, machinist's mate, first class, submarine A-7, United States Navy, who was killed by an explosion on board the vessel July 25, 1917, is hereby allowed an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Joseph Anthony Kunz was receiving at the date of his death, to wit, the sum of $445.92.

Sec. 2. That said Anton Kunz, father of said Joseph Anthony Kunz, deceased, aforesaid, be paid out of the Treasury of the United States a sum of money or an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Joseph Anthony Kunz was receiving at the time of his death.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 2, for the same reason as that given in the case of the former bill.

In this connection I should like to make the suggestion that many formal motions are made to reconsider and lay on the table. If that motion were not made, the right to reconsider would lie for only two days. If the Members wish to exercise that privilege, I suggest that at the conclusion of the consideration of these bills a general motion be made rather than to cumber up the Journal. It makes the Journal twice as long as is necessary, and for the sake of expedition and economy in the preparation of the Journal I make that suggestion, because there is no disposition to reconsider. We can make an omnibus motion at the close of the session to cover all of the bills.

Mr. BUTLER. Within the next two or three days we might discover that we desired to reconsider some bill. The House seems to be relying with a great deal of confidence upon the judgment of the Subcommittee on Naval Affairs, which considered this bill. It might be that within a day or two we might discover some little mistake that had been made.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to do away with the right to table a motion to reconsider, but my suggestion is that at the conclusion of these bills there be an omnibus request to reconsider and table as to all, rather than cumber up the Journal with separate motions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. That the payment of the amount of money hereby allowed and authorized to be paid is authorized to be made from the appropriations for beneficiaries of deceased members of the naval service who die while in active service of the United States Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the section number will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FRED G. LEITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 855), for the relief of Fred G. Leith, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think we ought to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, this man was for 15 or 16 years in the Medical Corps of the Navy. He went to France. The Army found itself without sufficient number of pharmacists and called upon the Navy to transfer some of their pharmacists to the Army corps. Under these circumstances he was transferred to the Army. He rendered valiant service there. He took part in six or eight of the battles. He was cited for distinguished service. He received the croix de guerre. He came back to this country with his corps and was discharged. I believe in Texas or some southern camp from the Army. Thereupon he wrote to the Navy and asked them if he reenlisted in the Navy he would retain his continuous service in the Navy. They telegraphed him in a general way to report to the recruiting officer for examination. He understood that if he reentered the Navy he would enter as a continuous-service man.

The question was not raised until his first pay day when the comptroller ruled that it was a new enlistment and he was not entitled to any increase by reason of previous service; that having left the Navy and gone into the Army at their request he lost all the benefits of continuous service. The matter has been put up to the Navy Department, and the Navy Department has written urging that the bill be passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the statement of facts so clearly presented by the gentleman from Rhode Island, I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the service rendered by Fred G. Leith, United States Navy, in the Army of the United States during the World War shall be considered as if rendered in the Navy of the United States for all purposes connected with continuous service in the Navy of the United States, and that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the records of the said Fred G. Leith in the Navy Department to be corrected to conform with this authorization, to the end that the said Fred G. Leith shall be entitled to all pay, benefits, and emoluments conferred by law or regulation for continuous service in the Navy of the United States.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island a question. Did this man voluntarily resign from the Navy and take a commission in the Army?

Mr. BURDICK. It was at the suggestion of the Navy Department and at the request of the Army that he severed his connection with the Navy and enlisted in the Army corps.

Mr. McKENZIE. Did he hold a commission in the Army?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; he was a lieutenant.

Mr. McKENZIE. How long was he out of the military service until he applied to be reinstated in the Navy?

Mr. BURDICK. Immediately on his separation from the Army he applied for reenlistment in the Navy.

Mr. McKENZIE. The only matter involved here is the question of his longevity pay?

Mr. BURDICK. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN McNAMARA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8921) for the relief of Ellen McNamara.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid to Ellen McNamara, mother of Frank X. McNamara, ordinary seaman, U. S. S. Buffalo and Cleveland, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by him at the date of his death.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I have just noticed in connection with this bill that no provision is made as to the money to pay it. Some amendment should certainly be carried in the bill to that effect. I suppose the intention of the committee was that such an amendment should be made. If the committee has any amendment, I will not attempt to frame one. I will withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer the following amendment: After the word "paid," in line 4, insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 4, after the word "paid," insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The author of this bill, my colleague Mr. SPROUL, of Illinois, is unfortunately at home ill. It occurs to me, however, as I understand the law, this man might have designated, and at one time did designate, a beneficiary. He designated his father, which he might do under the present law. If his father had survived him, the money would have been paid in due course. Through inadvertence his mother was not designated as a beneficiary after the father's death.

It seems to me that this could be paid out of the same fund as the father would have been paid from if he had survived. If this amendment which has been offered perfects the bill, I do not want to interpose an objection, but, on the contrary, would like to have it perfected so that the payment will be made.

Mr. DARROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly.

Mr. DARROW. It seems to me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is in order, and I would be glad to see his amendment prevail. While it was intended that the money should be paid out of the same fund as if the father had lived, I think this amendment will do no harm.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that case, we would have to carry the authorization carried in the two prior bills that the payment of the amount of money hereby allowed and authorized to be paid is authorized to be made out of the appropriation for beneficiaries of deceased Members who died while in active service.

RALPH S. KEYSER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 11340 to advance Maj. Ralph S. Keyser on the lineal list of officers of the United States Marine Corps, so that he will take rank next after Maj. John R. Henley.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some statement with respect to it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would say that this refers to the most distinguished man of the whole United States Marine Corps. He bears perhaps the most gallant record of them all. He is one of the celebrated six commanders of the battalion at Belleau Wood and the Argonne Forest.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I supplement what the chairman of the committee has said by saying that in the consideration of many of these private bills where we provide advancement numbers the officer in most instances has performed valiant service in the World War. In reading the reports I do not know of any one that appealed to me more strongly than has the present case. This man at some time committed indiscretions away back, when he was in the academy.

Mr. VINSON. When he was a first lieutenant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, it was very shortly after he graduated from the academy. Because of those indiscretions he was unduly punished by a reduction of 27 numbers. He proved his real worth in the World War as no other man could prove it. I say let bygones be bygones.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to advance Maj. Ralph S. Keyser on the lineal list of officers of the United States Marine Corps, so that he will take rank next after Maj. John R. Henley: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or emoluments shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M. PHILLIPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4723) for the relief of William M. Phillipson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have not seen the gentleman here for some time, and I shall be glad to reserve it on his account.

Mr. RAKER. I have been at work on three different committees trying to get legislation so that we could pass it, and I have been here whenever I have had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I would not think of insinuating that the gentleman did not have a good alibi.

Mr. RAKER. This man went to Tuolumne County, and settled there and then went into the service. The judge of the superior court there knew him when he was a young man. He had lived there for 40 years. I refer to Judge Nicol, who died just a few weeks ago. The other men referred to in the report were old residents, and they identify this man and his record and history, and it clearly shows by his affidavit of two pages and a half in the report that he was "shanghaied" and was kept from the service, and that he ought not to be denied his right as an American seaman. He gave valiant service during the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to give the impression that he was shanghaied upon this statement found on page 2 of the report, his own testimony, which is as follows:

A few days later we steamed up to Mare Island, where the worst cases of yellow fever were transferred to the Government hospital. About three weeks afterwards I was told to get ready to go on shore on liberty, although I had never asked permission to go on shore. I was not well—I was suffering from yellow fever, but some of my comrades said to come on, and I think I was given about $15, which was all the money that I have ever received from the Government.

Is that the basis of the gentleman's charge that he was shanghaied?

Mr. RAKER. No; it runs clear through his statement. There is no doubt about it. The judge wrote me about it, and so did ex-Senator Curtin.

Mr. STAFFORD. But where is the evidence of his being shanghaied?

Mr. RAKER. The only way I can show the gentleman that would be to read the affidavit.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I have read a part of it, which refutes the gentleman's contention.

Mr. RAKER. The only way you can get it is from the man's own statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have just cited a part of his affidavit which I think is material.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will read further on he will find the man was actually shanghaied. He went to a Norwegian boarding house, was sick, having yellow fever, and was taken from there to a ship in the harbor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have seen some of those boarding houses in Seattle, and I know the kind the gentleman refers to.

Mr. KRAUS. That was in the year 1864, and he was kept on the ship for more than a year before he returned to San Francisco.

Mr. RAKER. Every effort has been made since a few years ago by the State authorities to prevent shanghaiing. Before that time many men were shanghaied in San Francisco. This man is able to present a very good record. He lived where he was well known. The judge knew him for over 40 years, one of the most honorable men in the State of California. He knew him as a young man, he knew him when he was naturalized. He knew him when he went away and when he came back.

Mr. STAFFORD. Against the very surprising record furnished by the gentleman from California I wish to cite in opposition the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby, wherein he says in the concluding paragraph of his letter to the chairman of the committee dated March 14, 1921:

Furthermore, it would seem that Phillipson left the naval service at a time during the Civil War when his services were especially in demand and the records do not disclose such merits in his case as would warrant more favorable consideration than has been given a large number of other similar cases. While it is aware that the bill (H. R. 16084) died with the expiration of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the department nevertheless recommends, if a similar bill is introduced during a session of the present Congress, that favorable action be not taken thereon.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN DENBY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. RAKER. Truly he left the service; he was away sick with yellow fever near unto death. He was taken to the sea-board and kept on a ship a year and he then came back and served his Government. After he got back he enlisted again. He went back into the service again. He did everything that it was in the power of a human being to do. That is the history of the whole thing, verified by these men who can not be questioned.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin this gave us some little anxiety in the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not surprised.

Mr. BUTLER. We had the rule hanging on the wall with reference to these charges of desertion, that we would not permit a man to get through unless he showed white and clear. If he does not show he is worthy it is not given. This is one of the cases that we believe after sitting and hearing the facts, that he had been detained from the service and could not make a report, could not return, and therefore it was charged up against him.

Mr. STAFFORD. What service did he give the Government after his desertion?

Mr. RAKER. I think over two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have crossed the distinguished chairman on occasions, not with malice aforethought—

Mr. BUTLER. But not disturbing our good feeling.

Mr. STAFFORD. And on this occasion he makes a pretty strong appeal. I have crossed many times my good friend from California and he has always come up smiling afterwards, and I like him for it, and in this case I will give the benefit of the doubt to the gentleman from California and withdraw the objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws William M. Phillipson shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy: Provided, however, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANK GEORGE BAGSHAW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 397) to remove the charge of desertion against the name of Frank George Bagshaw.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have had some serious difficulty as to whether this bill should pass or not.

Mr. BURDICK. This bill—I presume the gentleman has read the report?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BURDICK. This young man enlisted in the Navy and deserted. He thereupon entered the militia of the State of Rhode Island, and when this country went into war he enlisted in the Air Service. He only served a few months, as I recall, in the Air Service when at the request of his wife he was discharged on account of dependency. He is seeking to remove that charge of desertion that is against his record as a very young man, not for the purpose of any pension or anything of the kind, but simply to clear up his name.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I would not bar the removal of the charge of desertion in the record of a veteran of the Spanish-American War or the Civil War if he really performed sincere service in the World War. The difficulty in this case was whether this man really intended to perform real service during the World War. He entered, as the gentleman says, the Rhode Island Militia on January 20, 1918, and was discharged on his application that he had a dependent wife and child July 27, 1918. It does not seem to me that was any real service which should entitle Congress to remit the charge of desertion that was against him arising out of the Spanish-American War service.

Mr. BURDICK. This young man, as I understand it, both from his own statement to me and that of his wife, entered the World War absolutely in good faith. After he was in the service his wife and family found they could not get along but were dependent upon his earnings to support them, and reluctantly he secured his discharge from the Army in order to go back and support his wife.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will permit a question, it appears from the report he served over three years in the Navy at the time of the Spanish-American War. Does the gentleman know whether that is a fair deduction?

Mr. BURDICK. That is as I understand the record.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What was the enlistment period at that time?

Mr. BURDICK. I think four years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that he deserted after three years' service during the period of the Spanish-American War and at a time when the war had been concluded, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Frank George Bagshaw, late an apprentice, third class, United States Navy, in view of his honorable service during the World War.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

On page 1, at the end of line 7, insert a colon and "Provided, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. SHEPPARD, and Mr. GLASS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RUSSELL WILMER JOHNSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10555) for the relief of Russell Wilmer Johnson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is another case where a soldier who had a dishonorable discharge against him performed valiant service during the World War that entitles the soldier to have that dishonorable discharge removed, and I shall not interpose an objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Russell Wilmer Johnson, late a landsman-seaman in the United States Navy, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "States," insert: "Provided, That the said Russell Wilmer Johnson shall not be by the passage of this act be entitled to any back pay or allowances."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

R. E. AMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 968) to change the retired status of Chief Pay Clerk R. E. Ames, United States Navy, retired.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

REIMBURSEMENT OF PATIENTS AT NAVAL HOSPITAL, HAMPTON ROADS, VA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9081) to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 2719, which is identical in terms.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2719) to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the persons herein named the following amounts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Joseph Julian Jordan, seaman, second class, $210; William Raney Pickard, apprentice seaman, $25; James Buchanan, apprentice seaman, $40; Orvin Jefferson Bullock, apprentice seaman, $70; William James Thomson, fireman, third class, $95; Raymond Leonard Martin, fireman, third class, $75; William Brewster, fireman, third class, $15; Hiram Bitts Dain, apprentice seaman, $22; Arlous Pate, apprentice seaman, $35; Alvin Curtis, fireman, third class, $30; Irvin Howard Neil, seaman, second class, $40; James Fred Taylor, hospital apprentice, second class, $80; Franklin Elmo Brown, pharmacist's mate, third class, $20; Hamilton Okey Johnston, hospital apprentice, second class, $20; Leo Sherry, hospital apprentice, first class, $20; Raymond Clyde Malouin, hospital apprentice, first class, $70; Canaco Nacional Nallaris, mess attendant, first class, $185; and Birley Thomas, fireman, third class, $75; being the respective amounts of their private funds which the said persons had placed in the safe in the office of the executive officer at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va., for safe-keeping, and which were stolen therefrom on or about April 1, 1921, by some unknown person or persons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the similar House bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN F. O'NEIL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8683) for the relief of John F. O'Neill.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FIRST INTERNATIONAL BANK OF SWEETGRASS, MONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2004) for the relief of the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have this bill reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to issue patent to the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont., for the south half of section 25, township 37 north, range 5 west, Montana principal meridian, upon payment by said bank of the value of said land, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, less any amounts loaned by said bank to Stephen Horgasz and remaining unpaid: Provided, That in no event shall patent so issue to said bank for said land except upon the payment therefor by said bank at the rate of not less than $1.25 per acre.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think the bill should be explained. If the author is not here, I will object.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman can explain the bill, I will reserve my objection.

Mr. VAILE. I am sorry I can not explain it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a little unusual to be patenting lands to international banks, when there are numerous ex-service men who fought for their country who are trying to purchase these lands.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, the facts in a general way are these: This bank loaned some money to a man on improvements to a piece of public land—

Mr. BLANTON. And violated the national banking laws when it did it.

Mr. VAILE. No; I am quite sure that the original loan was proper.

Mr. BLACK. This is not a national bank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN SULLIVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1690) to correct the military record of John Sullivan. The title of the bill was read.

ATLAS LUMBER CO. AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8499) for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co., each of which companies furnished to Silas N. Opdahl, a failing Government contractor, certain building materials which were used in the construction of Burke Hall at the Pierre Indian School, in the State of South Dakota.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to omit the reading of the preamble.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the reading of the preamble be omitted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the body of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: To the Atlas Lumber Co., a West Virginia corporation, at Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $3,530.65; to C. W. Babcock and T. B. Willcox, copartners as Babcock & Willcox, Kasota, Minn., the sum of $456.95; to Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., a Minnesota corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $855.94; and to C. H. Klein and C. T. Klein, copartners as the C. H. Klein Brick Co., of Chaska, Minn., the sum of $186.68.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Striking out all of the preamble, and on line 14 of page 3, after the figures "$186.68," inserting "each of which companies furnished to Silas N. Opdahl, a failing Government contractor, certain building materials which were used in the construction of Burke Hall at the Pierre Indian School, South Dakota."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the other amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the last "whereas" seems not to have been stricken out by the committee. I ask unanimous consent that that be stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the last "whereas" in the preamble be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, on page 3, line 7, after the word "corporation," strike out the phrase "at Minneapolis, Minn."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 7, after the word "corporation" strike out "at Minneapolis, Minn."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the title, so that it will read: "A bill for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRED E. JONES DREDGING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9862) for the relief of the Fred E. Jones Dredging Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the original bill, which has been stricken out, be omitted and that the suggested amendment of the committee be read in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the claim of the Fred E. Jones Dredging Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, and doing business in the city of Norfolk, Va., against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by a collision between its coal scow No. 3 and the steamship Minnesota, which occurred about 6 o'clock p. m. on February 20, 1919, while said coal scow, loaded with coal and equipment, was moored near the Norfolk & Western Railroad Co.'s merchandise pier No. 2, at Lamberts Point, Va., may be sued for by the said owners in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree therein for the amount of such damages sustained by reason of said collision as shall be found to be due either for or against the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability and damages as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill yield for a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not the practice in our Federal courts now that when suit is brought against the United States Government the Federal district attorney takes cognizance of it without this roundabout way of bringing notice of the suit to him through the Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have no doubt that is true, but this seems to be the form of bill agreed upon in the House, and all the bills have been written in that way.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that, but it occurs to me that it is rather a reflection on the district attorney's office, which is supposed to look out for the interests of the United States Government. There are not so many suits that can be brought against the United States. Where they are brought under authority of law, my experience has been that the Federal district attorneys take cognizance of them and look after them without any suggestion coming from Washington.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think there is anything in this bill to prevent the Federal district attorney doing that very thing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In a case like this, where special jurisdiction is given to hear the case, I think it is well to have provision for a special notice to the district attorney.

Mr. BLANTON. The Federal trial judge would do the same thing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think this shows care on the part of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. FLAGG AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7447) to reimburse William H. Flagg and others for property destroyed by mail airplane No. 73, operated by the Post Office Department.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. WATSON. I reserve the right to object. The proposition to pay damages caused by airplane accidents where the airplanes are owned by the Government is a new problem in law. There are very few legal decisions or precedents regulating damages caused by Government airplanes. I have known a number of cases where Government airplanes have damaged property, and the claims have not been recognized. I should like to know the special reasons why this claim should be favorably reported.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that this was a Government mail airplane flying across the city of Cleveland. For some reason it came down upon the house of one of the claimants, Torok. There were 120 gallons of gasoline in the tank, and it set fire to three of the houses and destroyed and damaged the furniture in three of the houses. There is no reason in the world why the Government of the United States should not pay these claims. There was no negligence at all on the part of the claimants, and they could not have avoided or prevented the accident in any way. Through the negligence of the driver of the airplane it came down on the houses and the furniture was damaged and the Torok house badly damaged. The Government should pay the claim. It is just.

Mr. EDMONDS. I should like to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] in regard to some people being paid and others not. The Government will recognize claims for damages by airplanes when the Government is at fault. We have done so in the case of a farm outside of New York where a crop was damaged. We have done so where a sloop was hit by an airplane and a man was killed. If the gentleman has a case that he would particularly like to have the committee take care of, I should be very glad to have him bring it before our committee and let us take care of it, because if the Government is to blame for these accidents we certainly ought to pay for them. The other day I called attention to an accident in Moundsville, W. Va., where it is going to cost the Government $200,000, and after reading the testimony in the case it is my opinion that the Government has a duty to perform to those people. Five people were killed and twenty-two were hurt, and several automobiles were burned up.

If we are going to give these public exhibitions of airplanes, if we are going to fly airplanes, we have got to pay damages when we are at fault, just as much as we pay for accidents occasioned by automobiles. This claimant was in his house. He owned the house. He is a poor man. He bought it on installments and furnished it on installments. Without any negligence on his part, a Government airplane flies into the side of his house, sets fire to it, and damages his furniture. He got some insurance, and we have deducted the amount of the insurance. We have given him the lowest amount of damages we possibly can. I think he is entitled to this. I tried to argue with him that the Government owned the air and that he had no business to have his house in the air, but he would not agree with me. He said if he could not build his house in the air he would have to build it in the cellar, and he did not want to live underground. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. Suppose it had been a private corporation that owned the airplane, and it had come down on the gentleman's house and destroyed it by fire. What would be the law so far as the payment of damages was concerned?

Mr. EDMONDS. The private corporation would undoubtedly have to pay the damages.

Mr. TILSON. The only difference is that it was the United States which owned the airplane instead of a private corporation owning it.

Mr. WATSON. Where airplanes are driven close to the earth accidents are liable, as airplanes frequently frighten horses in the fields. This practice of driving Government airplanes should be considered by the Government. I withdraw my objections.

Mr. EDMONDS. Let me say to the gentleman that if the claim is below $1,000, under the law which we passed a short time ago the Government can reimburse for those claims without authority of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of an objection I want to say that in the examination of quite a number of private bills I have found nothing wherein the committee has been so generous as in this case. We are attempting to reimburse the owners of buildings for damage which they did not suffer. In some cases the amount is awarded for repairs in excess of the loss sustained and paid by the insurance company. In the Torok case the damage amounted to $1,525.30, and the insurance company settled with the claimant for that sum. The property was insured for $3,000. Now you are proposing through overgenerosity of the committee—I would not charge that as to the other bills, but in this case it is proposed to give this man Torok $460. We are going to recognize the principle in this bill that if an owner of property lives at a distance from where the damage occurred and declines to take reasonable care to repair rented buildings after a fire loss is reimbursed we are to compensate him for loss of rent. These claimants seem to want to get as much money as possible out of the insurance companies, and then come to the Government and get something more out of the Government. This claim is about the worst claim that has been reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BULWINKLE. How much was the damage to this house?

Mr. STAFFORD. I read from page 3, first paragraph:

The New Jersey Fire Insurance Co. determined that the damage amounted to $1,525.30, and settled with the claimant for that sum. The property was insured to $3,000. The legislation contained the stipulated amount of $2,175 as the loss suffered.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The insurance offer was for three-quarters. They clearly lost the amount of the difference between the amount they received from the insurance company and the value of the home.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that it is just to pay damage to a man for loss by reason of rent when he refused to put his property in a rentable condition?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The loss of rent is not included here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read from page 4 of the report the statement of the post-office inspector.

I believe that the amount of insurance carried by Mr. Torok will more than cover the damage due to the accidental firing of the building by airplane No. 73. If taken in hand at once after the accident occurred the expenditure in placing the house in the original condition should not have exceeded $1,000.

He was awarded $1,525.30.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of a case of loss by fire that the buildings insured could be repaired before the amount was agreed upon. Any man who has had any business in settling claims against insurance companies of any kind knows that you can not make your repairs until the amount has been agreed upon. The amount that has been talked about as rent, which would be perfectly proper as a matter of fact, would be the difference between the time of the fire and the time they could come to some kind of an agreement. Here is a man that states that he had no money, nothing to make any kind of repairs with, because he did not have a cent coming in from any source. All he had of any kind was invested in this house, for which he was trying to pay, and, being deprived of its use, was required to pay rent. Any man who has had anything to do in settling claims against insurance companies knows that you can not make repairs until some arrangement has been made with the company. This man never received the amount of his loss that he suffered, a large part of which was not covered by the insurance policy. Here was a Government airplane and, without any fault on this man's part, it was flying over the city carrying the mail, and it descends upon this man's house, which takes fire through the negligence of the operator. This loss occurred in 1919, and these people have been trying to get some action on the matter ever since. It is a plain case. These people are poor people, and if there was ever a man entitled to the payment of a claim it is this. There was no question of contributory negligence in this case; it is not like an accident on a street by an automobile. It is a simple case of damage. The Government is liable. The committee has found the amount of the damage and has deducted the amount of insurance received, and it is a clear case where the Government ought to pay at least the amount recommended by the committee, for if there was ever a just claim this is one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

HARRY E. FISKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10529) for the relief of Harry E. Fiske.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,689.35 to Harry E. Fiske, on account of injuries received at the Watertown Arsenal, through no fault of his own, while testing a gun carriage on January 6, 1916.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

W. B. MOSES & SONS AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 11287, for the relief of W. B. Moses & Sons, Willis-Smith-Crall Co., American Home Furnishers' Corporation, Western Electric Co., and S. A. Curtis.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think that this is the kind of a bill that ought to be passed at this time. There are many other bills on the calendar that are much more meritorious. I reserve the objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this the bill where the officer bought solid mahogany furniture?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and I think it is a hardship for these firms to wait any longer for their pay. Here are three or four firms that supplied furniture to the Navy Department. We realize that the furniture purchased was out of all reason and common sense, and that it should not have been purchased. Nevertheless, here is a number of commercial concerns that are carrying on their books a charge against the Government for furniture which they furnished to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman not think it is time to stop a naval officer from buying 5 mahogany davenports at $200 each, 10 fine mahogany easy-chairs at $100 each, 10 mahogany dressers at $200 each, 5 mahogany chiffoniers at $200 each, 5 mahogany chifforettes at $200 each, 5 mahogany dressing tables at $150 each, and a lot of other such extravagant furniture for private use? Is it not about time for the Congress to stop such monkey business?

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee thinks so, certainly. The gentleman saw the resolution that was passed by the committee. We have notified the Navy Department and the Naval Committee of this extraordinary extravagance upon the part of naval officers.

Mr. BLANTON. How many fine leather mahogany davenports has the gentleman in his office in the House Office Building?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is not a question of that kind.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought not to permit a naval officer or any other officer to go down here and buy extravagant furniture of this kind in solid mahogany where there is no necessity for it, and we should stop it now.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee itself has recognized that, but here are honest merchants who have supplied that stuff.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman wants to pay the bill and authorize somebody else to incur like bills for the Government?

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Government of the United States is not going to pay its honest debts?

Mr. BLANTON. The Government of the United States will pay every debt that is honestly owed, but the time has come to stop officials in the Navy Department and in the Army and other departments from such wasteful extravagance.

Mr. EDMONDS. Has not the committee agreed with the gentleman on that?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, we are all agreed that these purchases were very extravagant. They were not made in conformity with law. I am wondering if the committee could have brought about a substantial reduction in the amount of these bills. For example, there are 10 easy, mahogany chairs, at $100 each; 5 chiffoniers, mahogany, at $200 each; 5 chifforettes, whatever they are, at $200 each.

Mr. EDMONDS. Also there are solid mahogany tables.

Mr. BLACK. It seems to me that these items are so extravagant that some reduction might be brought about in the amount of the bills and the claim settled on a substantially reduced basis.

Mr. TILSON. And the gentleman has forgotten the 10 solid mahogany dressers at $200 each.

Mr. BLACK. I am not undertaking to read all of the items. I merely read some of them to show the unreasonable extravagance of them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman please tell me who is this fearfully generous officer who bought this extravagant stuff? What is his name?

Mr. BLACK. I can give the gentleman the place of the purchase. During the fiscal year 1920 the supply officer of the United States Navy mine depot at Yorktown, Pa., made these purchases. I think it is quite high time that some action be taken that will prevent the purchasing officers of the Navy Department from making purchases of this kind. The best that we can say for it is that it is rank extravagance.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, we can not go out and buy this sort of furniture, because we can not afford it.

Mr. BLACK. My colleague, Mr. BLANTON, said he is going to object, but if he does not, I shall, until we can look into the matter and see if these claims can not be reduced.

Mr. BLANTON. If the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] will put into the Record in connection with this matter a list of the various articles purchased, their cost, together with the name of the man who purchased them, so that the people of the United States may know what is going on, I might feel more like withdrawing the objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Does the gentleman not think it would be a good idea to return this furniture to these people rather than to pay for it?

Mr. BLANTON. I think that is what the committee ought to have done.

Mr. DEAL. Does the gentleman think that this furniture should be returned to the owner after it has been in use for three years and used by Army officers and those who have had it in their use? These people have been deprived of the use of their property.

Mr. STEPHENS. They ought to inquire to whom they are selling such stuff.

Mr. DEAL. These Government agents come in and give their order, and they sell the goods on that order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEAL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to be absolutely fair with these people, but the gentleman from Virginia is a distinguished lawyer—I take that back because he says he is not. He looks so much like one that I always thought he was, but if he were a lawyer, he would know this, that whenever a merchant sells any kind of merchandise to an officer of the Government, he sells it to him under the provisions of a certain law and under certain authority that is definitely fixed and well defined, and when a merchant goes beyond the provisions of law and sells officers something that under that law will not be approved by the auditors of this Government, they do it at their own risk, and they ought to suffer. The only way we have to stop it is to let them know that we are not going to permit such extravagance.

Mr. DEAL. Their goods have been taken away from them and are in use by the Federal Government, and we ought to pay for them.

Mr. CRAGO assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is equivalent to a crime for any officer to be permitted to buy davenport at the rate of $200 apiece and chiffoniers at the rate of $200 apiece and dressers at the rate of $200 apiece. The officer who bought them at that price ought to be cashiered. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Ought to be in the penitentiary.

Mr. MADDEN. And we do not owe a thing to the people who sold this officer those goods at this price. These people here are dealing with the Government all the time. W. B. Moses and the rest of these people know what the Government regulations are; and if any officer comes and buys goods at a price not authorized by law, and these people who sell the goods know what the regulations are, they ought not to sell them; and if they do sell them, they ought not to be paid for.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Perhaps these gentlemen acquired these habits during the previous administration. This was also done during the previous administration.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to raise that question. The officers know they ought not to be permitted to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. And it ought to be stopped.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to make, as a portion of my remarks, the statement of the committee, because I am with the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois that it is an outrageous imposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman extending his remarks? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11287) for the relief of W. B. Moses, Willis-Smith-Crall Co., American Home Furnishers Corporation, Western Electric Co., and S. A. Curtis, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

These claims, as stated in the bill, represent orders which were placed after competition with the lowest bidders of the individual items, but without complying with the provisions of section 3744 of the Revised Statutes requiring contracts made by the Secretary of the Navy and the officers under him to be reduced to writing.

Section 3744 reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Secretary of the Interior to cause and require every contract made by them severally on behalf of the Government, or by their officers under them appointed to make such contracts, to be reduced to writing, and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof, a copy of which shall be filed by the officer making and signing the contract in the returns office of the Department of the Interior, as soon after the contract is made as possible, and within 30 days, together with all bids, offers, and proposals to him made by persons to obtain the same, and with a copy of any advertisement he may have published inviting bids, offers, or proposals for the same. All the copies and papers in relation to each contract shall be attached together by a ribbon and seal, and marked by numbers in regular order, according to the number of papers composing the whole return."

These supplies were purchased during the fiscal year of 1920 by the supply officers of the United States Navy mine depot, Yorktown, Va., for the use of that station.

As the supplies called for by the orders of the naval authorities were accepted and used by the Government, your committee recommends the passage of the bill for the payment of the claims.

Attached herewith is the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Navy. To incorporate in this report all of the papers in connection with these claims would serve no particular purpose. However, your committee desires to call the attention of the Members of the House to a few of the items, showing the reckless extravagance of the naval officials.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, December 19, 1921.

Sir: The department incloses herewith the following claims:

(a) Claim of W. B. Moses & Sons, Washington, D. C., amounting to $1,013, supported by contract and public bills.

(b) Claim of Willis-Smith-Crall Co., Norfolk, Va., amounting to $12,093.25, supported by contracts and public bills.

(c) Claim of American Home Furnishers Corporation, Richmond, Va., amounting to $7,007, supported by contract and public bills.

(d) Claim of Western Electric Co., New York, amounting to $2,319.12, supported by contract and public bills.

(e) Claim of S. R. Curtis, Leehall, Va., amounting to $1,125, supported by invoice and public bill.

During the fiscal year 1920 the supply officer of the United States Navy mine depot, Yorktown, Va., made various purchases and simply covered them by an order instead of by a contract properly signed by both parties in accordance with the requirements of section 3744 of the Revised Statutes.

The fact that the statute had not been complied with was not discovered until the receipt of invoices by the successor of the officer who placed the order. Therefore, in the belief that the matter was one for settlement by the auditor, all papers on the subject were forwarded to that officer for the necessary action in the premises. However, the auditor declined to make settlement on the ground that competition had not been invited as prescribed by section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. Facts were then produced which showed that section 3709 had been complied with and the matter was accordingly appealed to the comptroller, who held that competition had been obtained, but at the same time sustained the disallowance on the ground that section 3744 of the Revised Statutes had not been complied with. After these decisions were rendered the accompanying contracts were prepared under the assumption that such action would meet the requirements of the law, and the matter was then referred to the Comptroller General of the United States with request that he reconsider the previous decision, but in connection with several of the claims he stated that:

"There had not been a compliance with section 3744, Revised Statutes, and therefore allowance could not be made on the basis of an express contract. The decision then went on to hold that the delivery and acceptance of the furniture, which was the subject matter of the claims, gave rise to an implied contract, on the basis of which allowance could have been made by the accounting officers, if there had been proper evidence of the reasonable value of the furniture."

"The making of the formal contracts submitted July 14 and July 15, 1921, so long after the transactions were made, is not a compliance with the requirements of the law and presents nothing upon which payment would be authorized. It can not be accepted as evidence of the value of the furniture."

"Furthermore, the contracts are not new and material evidence such as is necessary in order that I may reopen a case decided by my predecessor."
